

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFATORY NOTE.

NOR to know De Quincey is to be ignorant of some of the most remarkable literary products of the century. His writings, contributed originally to magazines, have taken a permanent place in literature. For breadth of scope, for power and delicacy of thought, and for beauty and clearness of style, he is surpassed by none of his contemporaries, if, indeed, he is equalled by any one of them. In logic, humor, irony; in subtle power of analysis; in an apparently intuitive skill in adapting language to thought; in richness of illustration; in his unparalleled imagination, De Quincey stands in the very front rank of authors of all time. His description of a great scholar is but a partial description of himself: "Not one who depends simply on an infinite memory, but also on an infinite and electrical power of combination, bringing together from the four winds, like the angel of the resurrection, what else were dust from dead men's bones into the unity of breathing life."

It is doubtless true that the highest appreciation of De Quincey is possible only to those possessing a wide knowledge of literature and of men, and an imagination of unusual brilliancy; but it is also true that his writings can furnish a keen enjoyment to many not possessed of his own great qualities. It is hoped that the selections here given will stimulate thought, and lead to a closer acquaintance with this master of English prose.

INTRODUCTION.

THOMAS DE QUINCEY.

THOMAS DE QUINCEY was born in Manchester, August 15, 1785, and died in Edinburgh, December 8, 1859, at the age of seventy-four. The family was Norman, having crossed the channel with the Conqueror, as the boy Thomas, at the age of fifteen, proudly told His Majesty, George III. Says De Quincey: "The family ascended to the highest rank in both kingdoms (England and Scotland), and held the highest offices open to a subject." They took a distinguished part in at least one of the Crusades, and in the Barons' Wars in the time of Henry III. They were frequently, like many other noble houses, in arms against the reigning monarch; and, in the thirteenth century, the head of the house, the Earl of Winchester, was attainted for treason. The Quincys of Massachusetts are descended from the same stock.

The father of Thomas was a man of literary taste and ability, a successful merchant, who, dying at the age of thirty-nine, left a widow and six children. Mrs. De Quincey seems to have been a woman of unusual ability; and the ample income derived from her husband's estate (£1,600 a year) enabled her to give her children the education which her own excellent judgment prescribed for them. That De Quincey recognized (in later years, at least) the advantages of his childhood is evident from the following passage, which refers, probably, to their life at Greenhay, the family mansion near Manchester:—

“We, the children of the house, stood, in fact, upon the very happiest tier in the social scaffolding for all good influences. The prayer of Agur—‘Give me neither poverty nor riches’—was realized for us. That blessing we had, being neither too high nor too low. High enough we were to see models of good manners, of self-respect, and of simple dignity; obscure enough to be left in the sweetest of solitudes. Amply furnished with all the nobler benefits of wealth, with extra means of health, of intellectual culture, and of elegant enjoyment, on the other hand, we knew nothing of its social distinctions. Not depressed by the consciousness of privations too sordid, not tempted into restlessness by the consciousness of privileges too aspiring, we had no motives for shame, we had none for pride. Grateful also to this hour I am that, amidst luxuries in all things else, we were trained to a Spartan simplicity of diet—that we fared, in fact, very much less sumptuously than the servants. And if (after the model of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius) I should return thanks to Providence for all the separate blessings of my early situation, these four I would single out as worthy of special commemoration,—that I lived in a rustic solitude; that this solitude was in England; that my infant feelings were moulded by the gentlest of sisters, and not by horrid, pugilistic brothers; finally, that I and they were dutiful and loving members of a pure, holy, and magnificent church.”

De Quincey possessed a delicately organized, sensitive nature, with an intellect wonderfully subtle. While he was from infancy given to day-dreaming, he was also singularly observant and alert. “My life,” he says, “has been, on the whole, the life of a philosopher. From my birth I was made an intellectual creature, and intellectual in the highest sense my pursuits and pleasures have been." "At less than eleven years of age, when as yet I was a very indifferent Grecian, I had become a brilliant master of Latinity, as my alcaics and choriambics remain to testify." "At thirteen I wrote Greek with ease; and at fifteen my command of that language was so great that I not only composed Greek verses in lyric metres, but would converse in Greek fluently and without embarrassment." "'That boy,' said one of my masters, pointing the attention of a stranger to me — 'that boy could harangue an Athenian mob better than you or I could address an English one.'"

This mastery of the classics was obtained, notwithstanding his early education was somewhat desultory, with a clergyman in Manchester, at the Bath Grammar School, in a private school in Wiltshire, and in the Manchester Grammar School. To the last-named school he was sent at the age of fifteen, against his inclination and protests; and he found it so intolerable that, after enduring it for a year and a half, he left it by stealth, walking to his mother's home in Chester, a distance of forty miles. This escapade, or, as he calls it, "elopement," met his mother's emphatic disapproval; but, owing to the kind intercession of an uncle, he was granted an allowance of a guinea a week, with permission to reside in Wales. After living the life of a vagrant in North Wales for a few months, he suddenly went to the metropolis, hiding himself in "the nation of London," hoping to secure money from the money-lenders there on his "expectations." Here he suffered from absolute want of food and shelter, and would probably have died but for the succor of an outcast whom he ever after remembered with the deepest gratitude.

Of this part of his life De Quincey writes, in his "Confessions:" "I now suffered, for upwards of sixteen weeks, the physical anguish of hunger in various degrees of intensity; but as bitter, perhaps, as ever any human being can have sufferred who has survived it. A few fragments of bread from the breakfast table of one individual (who supposed me to be ill, but did not know of my being in utter want), and these at uncertain intervals, constituted my whole support."

After a year of this London life De Quincey was reconciled to his guardians; and in 1803, at the age of nineteen, he entered Worcester College, Oxford.

De Quincey's sufferings in Wales and London, of which he says he has not told a thousandth part, doubtless left their impress upon him; for, years afterwards, Carlyle said of him: "Eccovi! look at him: this child has been in Hell."

De Quincey states that his residence at Oxford extended from 1803 to 1808, though his name appears on the books of his college till 1810. Apparently he followed his own fancy in reading, with but little regard to college requirements, and but little contact with the instructors. "I remember distinctly," he says, "the first (which happened also to be the last) conversation that I ever held with my tutor. It consisted of three sentences, two of which fell to his share, one to mine." He lived the life of a recluse, "did not speak one hundred words during his first two years at Oxford," and devoted himself to the study of literature, classical, German, and English. He speaks of "the tremendous hold taken of his entire sensibilities at this time by our own literature." He left Oxford without taking a degree.

It was during his second year at the University that he first tasted opium, and laid the foundations of that pernicious habit which shattered his will-power, and rendered him, sometimes for consecutive years, incapable of sustained exertion. In 1813 opium had become an article of daily diet. In 1816 he sometimes consumed eight thousand drops of laudanum per day. Later, he took as much as twelve thousand drops (equal to grains of opium) daily. His struggles to free himself from the chains of this appetite are depicted with great pathos in his "Confessions of an English Opium-Eater," first published in the London Magazine in 1821.

In 1809 De Quincey took up his abode at Grasmere, where he enjoyed the society of Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, and Wilson, the famous "Lakists." Here he married, in 1816. The cottage which had been Wordsworth's was his home for twenty years; and he gives a glimpse of a charming domestic life in it thus: "Paint me, then, a room seventeen feet by twelve, and not more than seven and a half feet high. Make it populous with books, and furthermore, paint me a good fire; and furniture plain and modest, befitting the unpretending cottage of a scholar. And near the fire paint me a tea-table; and (as it is clear that no creature can come to see one such a stormy night) place only two cups and saucers on the tea-tray; and, if you know how to paint such a thing symbolically, or otherwise, paint me an eternal teapot, — eternal à parte ante, and à parte post; for I usually drink tea from eight o'clock at night to four in the morning. And, as it is very unpleasant to make tea, or to pour it out for one's self, paint me a lovely young woman sitting at the table. Paint her arms like Aurora's, and her smiles like Hebe's; — but no, dear M., not even in jest let me insinuate that thy power to illuminate my cottage rests upon a tenure so perishable as mere personal beauty, or that the witchcraft of angelic smiles lies within the empire of any earthly pencil."

This "lovely young woman" was his wife, Margaret Simpson, whom he married in her nineteenth year, and who shared his lot for twenty-one years, leaving six children, the eldest, Margaret, a womanly girl less than twenty years old. Two children (boys) had preceded their mother to the grave.

De Quincey had now, under the goad of financial difficulties, entered upon his career of a writer of magazine articles, of which he was the author of fully one hundred and fifty. From 1821 to 1825 he was a contributor to the London Magazine, spending much of his time in London. From 1825 to 1849 he wrote principally for Blackwood (fifty articles), and was frequently in Edinburgh. He also wrote for Tait's Magazine, and for Hogg's Instructor. His "Logic of Political Economy," the only one of his writings that first appeared in book form, was published in 1844, though written several years earlier.

His magazine articles were first republished, in volumes, in Boston, beginning in 1852, without his knowledge. The American publishers generously shared the profits of the venture with him. The first English edition of his collected writings was begun in 1853.

In 1830 De Quincey removed his home from Grasmere to Edinburgh; and in 1840 till his death he had a quiet cottage at Lasswade, seven miles from Edinburgh, in which city most of his time was spent.

For a few months prior and subsequent to his marriage, De Quincey had reduced his daily allowance of opium, with the most beneficial results. "It was a year of brilliant water (to speak after the manner of jewellers), set, as it were, and insulated in the gloomy umbrage of opium. Now, then, I was again happy; I now took only one thousand drops of laudanum per day, — and what was that? A latter spring had come to close up the season of youth: my brain performed its functions as healthily as ever before. I read Kant again, and again I understood him, or fancied that I did." But this reduction of the daily dose of the deadly drug was short-lived, and he was again in the power of the demon.

"Up to the middle of 1817 I judged myself to have been a happy man. But now farewell, a long farewell, to happiness, winter or summer! farewell to smiles and laughter! farewell to peace of mind! farewell to hope and to tranquil dreams, and to the blessed consolations of sleep! For more than three years and a half I am summoned away from these; I am now arrived at an Iliad of woes, for I have now to record the pains of opium." He seemed to have lost the power of will; since every duty was neglected,—studies, correspondence, domestic affairs. His nights were even more dreadful than his days. "I seemed every night to descend—not metaphorically, but literally to descend—into chasms and sunless abysses, depths below depths, from which it seemed hopeless that I could ever re-ascend. Nor did I, by waking, feel that I had re-ascended. This I do not dwell upon, because the state of gloom which attended these gorgeous spectacles, amounting at least to utter darkness, as of some suicidal despondency, cannot be approached by words."

From this condition he aroused himself by a desperate effort. "A crisis arrived for the author's life, and a crisis for other objects still dearer to him, and which will always be far dearer to him than his life. I saw that I must die if I continued the opium. I determined, therefore, if that should be required, to die in throwing it off." But he never entirely abstained from the use of opium.

De Quincey is thus described by Mr. J. R. Findlay: "A short and fragile, but well-proportioned frame; a shapely and compact head; a face beaming with intellectual light, with rare, almost feminine beauty of feature and complexion; a fascinating courtesy of manner; and a fulness, swiftness, and elegance of silvery speech,—such was the irresistible 'mortal mixture of earth's mould' that men named De Quincey. He possessed in a high degree what the American poet Lowell calls 'the grace of perfect breeding, everywhere persuasive and nowhere emphatic;' and his whole aspect and manner exercised an undefinable attraction over every one, gentle or simple, who came within its influence."

John Hill Burton, in his "Book Hunter," thus describes De Quincey under the name "Papavegius:"—

"No one speaks of waiting dinner for him. He will come and depart at his own sweet will, neither burdened with punctualities nor burdening others by exacting them. The festivities of the afternoon are far on, when a commotion is heard in the hall, as if some dog or other stray animal had forced its way in. The instinct of a friendly guest tells him of the arrival: he opens the door and fetches in the little stranger. What can it be? A street boy of some sort? His costume, in fact, is a boy's duffle great-coat, very threadbare, with a hole in it, and, buttoned tight to the chin, where it meets the fragments of a party-colored belcher handkerchief; on his feet are list shoes, for it is a stormy winter night; and the trousers—some one suggests that they are inner linen garments blackened with writing-ink, but that Papaverius never would have been at the trouble so to disguise them. What can be the theory of such a costume? The simplest thing in the world,—it consisted of the fragments of apparel nearest at hand. Had chance thrown to him a court single-breasted coat, with a bishop's apron, a kilt, and top-boots, in these he would have made his entry.

"The first impression that a boy has appeared vanishes instantly."

In Mrs. Gordon's life of her father, Professor Wilson, with whom De Quincey was intimate, is this characteristic story:—

"I remember his coming to Gloucester Place one stormy night. He remained hour after hour, in vain expectation that the waters would assuage and the hurly-burly cease. There was nothing for it but that our visitor should remain all night. The Professor ordered a room to be prepared for him; and they found each other such good company that this accidental detention was prolonged, without further difficulty, for the greater part of a year. During this visit some of his eccentricities did not escape observation. For example, he rarely appeared at the family meals, preferring to dine in his own room at his own hour, not unfrequently turning night into day. His tastes were very simple, though a little troublesome, at least to the servant who prepared his repast. Coffee, boiled rice and milk, and a piece of mutton from the loin, were the materials that invariably formed his diet. The cook, who had an audience with him daily, received her instructions in silent awe, quite overpowered by his manner; for, had he been addressing a duchess, he could scarcely have spoken with more deference. He would couch his request in such terms as these: 'Owing to dyspepsia afflicting my system, and the possibility of any additional disarrangement of the stomach taking place, consequences incalculably distressing would arise, so much so, indeed, as to increase nervous irritation, and prevent me from attending to matters of overwhelming importance, if you do not remember to cut the mutton in a diagonal rather than in a longitudinal form.' The cook, a Scotchwoman, had great reverence for Mr. De Quincey as a man of genius; but, after one of these interviews, her patience was pretty well exhausted, and she would say, 'Weel, I never heard the like o' that in my days; the bodie has an awfu' sicht o' words. If it had been my ain maister that was wanting his dinner, he would ha' ordered a hale tablefu' wi' little mair than a waff o' his hann; and here's a' this claver aboot a bit mutton nae bigger than a prin. Mr. De Quincey would mak' a gran' preacher, though I'm thinking a hantle o' the folk wouldna ken what he was driving at.'"

During the last few years of his life his evenings were usually spent with his daughters at Lasswade. Here the charming character of the man appeared. One of his daughters thus describes an evening in their modest home;—

“The newspaper was brought out, and he, telling in his own delightful way, rather than reading, the news, would, on questions from this one or that one of the party, often including young friends of his children, neighbors or visitors from distant places, illuminate the subject with such a wealth of memories, of old stories, of past or present experiences, of humor, of suggestion, even of prophecy, as by its very wealth makes it impossible to give any taste of it. He was not a reassuring man for nervous people to live with, as those nights were exceptions on which he did not set something on fire, the commonest incident being for some one to look up from book or work to say casually, ‘Papa, your hair is on fire ;’ of which a calm ‘Is it, my love?’ and a hand rubbing out the blaze was all the notice taken.”

“De Quincey has fully defined his own position and claim to distinction in the preface to his collected works. These he divides into three classes: ‘first, that class which proposes primarily to amuse the reader,’ such as the ‘Narratives, Autobiographic Sketches, etc.,’ ‘second, papers which address themselves purely to the understanding as an insulated faculty, or do so primarily,’ such as the essays on Essenism, the Cæsars, Cicero, etc.; and, finally, as a ‘third class,’ and, in virtue of their aim, as a far higher class of compositions,’ he ranks those modes of impassioned prose ranging under no precedents that I am aware of in any literature, such as the ‘Confessions’ and ‘Suspiria de Profundis.’ The high claim here asserted has been so far questioned; and short and isolated examples of eloquent apostrophe and highly wrought imaginative description have been cited from Rousseau and other masters of style: but De Quincey’s power of sustaining a fascinating and elevating strain of ‘impassioned prose’ is allowed to be entirely his own. In this his genius most emphatically asserts itself; if it be not admitted that in that dread circle none durst walk but he, it will be without hesitation conceded that there he moves supreme. Another obvious quality of all his genius is its overflowing fulness of allusion and illustration, recalling his own description of a great philosopher or scholar, — ‘Not one who depends simply on an infinite memory, but also on an infinite and electrical power of combination, bringing together from the four winds, like the angel of the resurrection, what else were dust from dead men’s bones into the unity of breathing life.’ To the discussion of things new, as readily as of things old, aided by a capacious, retentive, and ready memory, which dispensed with references to printed pages, he brought also the exquisite keenness and subtlety of his highly analytic and imaginative intellect, the illustrative stores of his vast and varied erudition, and that large infusion of common-sense which preserved him from becoming at any time a mere doctrinaire or visionary. Surprising as his literary achievements are, his capabilities were still greater; and the general survey leaves the impression of regret that, doing so much so well, he did not do more, or did not less better. Some things in his own line he has done perfectly: he has written many pages of magnificently mixed argument, irony, humor, and eloquence, which, for sustained brilliancy, richness, subtle force, and purity of style and effect, have simply no parallels; and he is without peer the prince of dreamers. The use of opium no doubt stimulated this remarkable faculty of reproducing in skilfully selected phrase the grotesque and shifting forms of that ‘cloudland, gorgeous land,’ which opens to the sleep-closed eye; but the faculty itself was a specialty of his constitution, colored by the quality of his genius, and enriched by the acquisitions of his intellect.

“To the appreciation of De Quincey the reader must bring an imaginative faculty somewhat akin to his own, — a certain general culture, and large knowledge of books, and men, and things. Otherwise much of that slight and delicate allusion that gives point and color and charm to his writings will be missed; and on this account the full enjoyment and comprehension of De Quincey must always remain a luxury of the literary and intellectual. But his skill in narration, his rare pathos, his wide sympathies, the pomp of his dream-descriptions, the exquisite playfulness of his lighter dissertations, and his abounding though delicate and subtle humor, commend him to a larger class. He was a born critic and dreamer, a logician by instinct and culture, a student by choice, a scholar by right of conquest of the stores of many minds, a writer of English of the first quality by dint of native command of language and lifelong study and practice. His style, full and flexible, pure and polished, is peculiarly his own. It consists simply in the reader's assurance of the writer's complete mastery over all the infinite applicability and resources of the English language." — J. R. FINDLAY.

"De Quincey ranges with great freedom over the accumulated wealth of the language, his capacious memory giving him a prodigious command of words. His range is perhaps wider than either Macaulay's or Carlyle's, as he is more versatile in the 'pitch' of his style, and does not disdain to use the 'slang' of all classes, from Cockney to Oxonian." — DAVID MASSON.

"A great deal of De Quincey's best and most characteristic writing is in the stately and elaborate style here described [Professor Masson has been quoting a passage from De Quincey's comparison of the styles of Hazlitt and Lamb], — the style of sustained splendor, of prolonged wheeling and soaring, as distinct from the style of crackle and brief glitter, of chirp and short flight. This is precisely on account of the exalted and intricate nature of his meaning and feeling in those cases ; and, if some readers there fall off from him or dislike him, it is because they themselves are deficient in wing and sinew. For those who do adhere to him and follow him in his passages of more involved and sustained eloquence, there are few greater pleasures possible in modern English prose. However magnificent the wording, there is always such an exact fit between it and the amount and shape of the under-fluctuating thought, that suspicion of inflation or bombast never occurs to one. The same presence everywhere of a vigilant intellect appears in the perfect logical articulation of sentence with sentence, and of clause with clause ; while the taste of the technical artist appears equally in the study of minute optical coherence in the imagery and in the fastidious care for fine sound. In this last quality of style — to which, in its lowest degree, Bentham gave the name of pronunciability, insisting most strenuously on its importance in all writing — De Quincey is a master. Such was the delicacy of his ear, however, that mere pronunciability was not enough for him, and musical beauty had to be superadded. Once, writing of Father Newman, and having described him as ‘originally the ablest son of Puseyism, but now a powerful architect of religious philosophy on his own account,’ he interrupts himself to explain that he might have ended the sentence more briefly by substituting for the last nine words the single phrase ‘master-builder,’ but that his ear could not endure ‘a sentence ending with two consecutive trochees, and each of these trochees ending with the same syllable er.’ He adds, ‘Ah, reader, I would that the gods had made thee rhythmical, that thou mightest comprehend the thousandth part of my labors in the evasion of cacophony.’” — DAVID MASSON.

DE QUINCEY'S STYLE.

[An able discussion of the style of De Quincey is given by Professor William Minto, in his "Manual of English Prose Literature," to which the teacher is referred.]

ITS ELEMENTS.

De Quincey was partial to words of Latin origin, and by their use gained precision in the expression of his thought and a rhythm impossible with an Anglo-Saxon vocabulary. But there is nothing in his writings suggestive of the style of Johnson.

His writings abound in illustrations of the periodic sentence, always stately, but frequently long and involved. His has been called "the most eminent of modern masters" of periodic style; but his sentences are occasionally overloaded with qualifying clauses and parenthetical allusions to such an extent that many readers find difficulty in comprehending him. His desire to connect his sentences properly often produces this result. "The two capital secrets of prose composition," he remarks, "are these: first, the philosophy of transition and connection; second, the way in which sentences are made to modify each other." Professor Bain says of one of De Quincey's long sentences: "The words that make reference to what precedes . . . form a considerable part of the sentence. Such profusion is characteristic of the author. The writings of De Quincey deserve especial mention on the point of explicit reference." But De Quincey knew the value of short sentences. See, for instance, the passage on page 66, beginning, "There is the great English Prince."

De Quincey delights in tropes. "He uses comparatively few formal similitudes," says Minto, "but his pages are thickly strewn with 'tropes,' with metaphors, personifications, synecdoches, and metonymies."

ITS QUALITIES.

His style cannot be called simple: it is frequently abstruse. But, if not always clear, it is exact. Minto says, "None of our writers in general literature have shown themselves so scrupulously precise. His works are still the crowning delicacy for lovers of formal, punctilious exactness." They abound in examples of strength, elevation, and sublimity, in pathos and in humor. His "Joan of Arc" furnishes many examples of deep pathos; while touches of delicate wit and humor illumine the driest subjects. His sense of the ludicrous seems sometimes to lead him beyond the bounds of good taste. But these are minor blemishes in a style that may be studied to advantage by any one. Of the melody and harmony of his style, Minto thus speaks:—

"The melody of De Quincey's prose is pre-eminently rich and stately. He takes rank with Milton as one of our greatest masters of stately cadence, as well as of sublime composition. If one may trust one's ear for a general impression, Milton's melody is sweeter and more varied; but for magnificent effects, at least in prose, the palm must probably be assigned to De Quincey. In some of De Quincey's grandest passages the language can be compared only to the swell and crash of an orchestra."

"The crowning glory of his writings is their style, so full of involved melody, so exact and careful, so rich in magnificent apostrophes, so markedly original, so polished and elaborate. He never forgot that the prose writer, if he wishes to attain excellence, must be as much of an artist as the poet, and fashion his periods and paragraphs with as much care as the poet elaborates his rhymes and cadences. Many passages might be quoted from De Quincey of which the melody is so striking as to irresistibly attract attention, and make us linger lovingly over them, apart altogether from the matter they contain."—NICOLI'S "Landmarks of English Literature."

"Though De Quincey was convinced that prose was his forte, and wisely worked in it, he had not a little of that poetic genius which is found in all great prose writers, and is intensified, as in his case so fully, by an intimate acquaintance with the best specimens of poetry. He had what lies below all high expression in prose or poetry—the instinct of literary form—what Matthew Arnold would call the sense of beauty. Intellectual as his style was, it was conspicuously artistic, and in this he has done the unspeakable service of showing that the best work in prose literature is neither the purely didactic nor the purely imaginative, but is seen in the judicious combination of those elements in what may be termed the expression of thought in æsthetic form."—HUNT'S "English Prose Writers."

"One may fancy that if De Quincey's language were emptied of all meaning whatever, the mere sound of the words would move us, as the lovely word Mesopotamia moved Whitefield's hearers. The sentences are so delicately balanced, and so skilfully constructed, that his finer passages fix themselves in the memory without the aid of meter. Humbler writers are content if they can get through a single phrase without producing a jar. They aim at keeping up a steady jog-trot, which shall not give actual pain to the jaws of the readers. Even our great writers generally settle down to a stately but monotonous gait, after the fashion of Johnson or Gibbon, or are content with adopting a style as transparent and inconspicuous as possible. Language, according to the common phrase, is the dress of thought; and that dress is best, according to modern canons of taste, which attracts least attention from its wearer. De Quincey scorns this sneering maxim of prudence, and boldly challenges our admiration by appearing in the richest coloring that can be got out of the dictionary. His language deserves a commendation sometimes bestowed by ladies upon rich garments, that it is capable of standing up by itself. The form is so admirable that, for purposes of criticism, we must consider it as something apart from the substance. The most exquisite passages in De Quincey's writings are all more or less attempts to carry out the idea expressed in the title of the "Dream Fugue." They are intended to be musical compositions, in which words have to play the part of notes. They are impassioned, not in the sense of expressing any definite sentiment, but because, from the structure and combination of the sentences, they harmonize with certain phases of emotion. It is in the success with which he produces such effects as these that De Quincey may fairly claim to be almost, if not quite, unrivalled in our language. Melancholy and an awe-stricken sense of the vast and vague are the emotions which he communicates with the greatest power; though the melancholy is too dreamy to deserve the name of passion, and the terror of the infinite is not explicitly connected with any religious emotion. It is a proof of the fineness of his taste that he scarcely ever falls into bombast. We tremble at his audacity in accumulating gorgeous phrases; but we confess that he is justified by the result. I know of no other modern writer who has soared into the same regions with so uniform and easy a flight." — LESLIE STEPHEN'S "Hours in a Library."

JOAN OF ARC.

[Since De Quincey did not purpose "to write the history of La Pucelle," a brief sketch of her life is here given.]

WHEN Joan of Arc presented herself before the Dauphin near the close of The Hundred Years' War, France was on the verge of total exhaustion. The wretched nation had suffered from foreign invasion and intestine strife.

The best blood of its gallant men had been shed on the fatal fields of Crecy, of Poitiers, and of Agincourt. Its loyal women and tender children had shared with their husbands and fathers the famine fever of the sieges of Rouen and of Meaux. The English Henry had conquered Normandy, and was striving to win its loyalty to himself, when the assassination of the Duke of Burgundy by the Dauphin had again plunged the country into the horrors of fratricidal warfare. The new Duke of Burgundy, Philip the Good, had become the fierce ally of the English invader. The treaty of Troyes (1420) had declared Henry V. Regent of France and heir to its throne on the death of Charles VI.; had commanded all princes, peers, vassals, and communities of France to swear allegiance to Henry; had placed the administration of the affairs of the kingdom in Henry's hands, and had united Henry, Charles, and Philip in active warfare against the Dauphin and his followers. Henry had entered Paris in triumph, and had been solemnly recognized by the States-General of the realm as the future sovereign of France.

Even the death of Henry and of Charles (1422) brought no relief to unhappy France; for the infant Henry VI. had been at once proclaimed King of France, and the Dauphin had assumed the title of Charles VII. The Duke of Bedford, the warlike brother of the late king, had assumed the command of the allied forces, had defeated the Dauphin at Verneuil (1424), and had now invested Orleans (1428).

"Seldom has the extinction of a nation's independence appeared more inevitable than was the case in France when the English invaders completed their lines round Orleans. A series of dreadful defeats had thinned the chivalry of France, and daunted the spirits of her soldiers. A foreign king had been proclaimed in her capital, and foreign armies of the bravest veterans, led by the ablest captains then known in the world, occupied the fairest portions of her territory. Worse to her, even, than the fierceness and the strength of her foes, were the factions, the vices, and the crimes of her own children. Her native prince was a dissolute trifler, stained with the assassination of the most powerful noble of the land, whose son, in revenge, had leagued himself with the enemy. Many more of her nobility, many of her prelates, her magistrates, and rulers, had sworn fealty to the English king. The condition of the peasantry amid the general prevalence of anarchy and brigandage, which were added to the customary devastations of contending armies, was wretched beyond the power of language to describe." — CREASY: Fifteen Decisive Battles, chap. ix.

It was at this crisis, when the English were masters of all French territory north of the Loire, when Orleans, the last stronghold of the French national party, the only remaining obstacle to the entire subjugation of the kingdom, had already offered to surrender to the Duke of Burgundy, when the pusillanimous Charles was preparing to abandon the country which he was too weak to save, — it was at this supreme moment of despair that Joan of Arc appears. “Gentle Dauphin,” said she, “my name is Jeanne the Maid. The Heavenly King sends me to tell you that you shall be anointed and crowned in the city of Rheims.”

Joan of Arc (or Jeanne d'Arc, or perhaps more properly, Joanneta Darc) was born about 1411, at Domrémy, a village partly in Champagne, partly in Lorraine. She was the third daughter of Jacques Darc, a peasant proprietor, and his wife, Isabeau de Vauthon. Joan was a strong, healthy girl, proficient in housework, unable to read or write, taught by her mother to repeat the Pater Noster, the Ave Maria, and the Credo. As she grew to womanhood her thoughts seemed to be fixed on the unhappy condition of her country. Her ardent patriotism, sympathetic nature, and earnest piety led her to spend much time in meditation and prayer for her country. ✓ Her vivid imagination assisted her belief in the reality of supernatural visitation. These “Heavenly Voices,” as she called them, were first perceived by her about the age of thirteen; and she persisted to the bitter end that she had been directed by them. She was convinced that it was her duty to relieve Orleans, and cause the Dauphin to be crowned at Rheims. Accordingly, against the wishes of her parents, to whom in all other respects she had been a dutiful daughter, she secured an audience with Charles, then holding court at Chinon. After considerable hesitancy Charles accepted her proffered assistance; and she soon marched with four thousand or five thousand men to the relief of Orleans. April 29, 1429, she entered Orleans at the head of her relieving army. The French were greatly inspired by her presence, attributing her success to divine interposition. The English were correspondingly depressed in spirit, believing Joan to be in league with the devil. The English raised the siege of Orleans May 8, 1429. The French pursued, defeating the English in the decisive battle of Patay, and driving them north of the Loire. July 17, of the same year, Charles was crowned at Rheims; and Joan, having accomplished her divinely inspired mission, the relief of Orleans and the crowning of Charles, begged to be relieved of all further duty, and to be permitted to retire to the home of her parents. She was prevailed upon, however, to continue with the army; and fought with equal devotion, though perhaps with less enthusiasm, declaring that she would perish within a year. In a disastrous attack on Paris, September 8, she was severely wounded; and on the 24th of May, 1430, while leading an unsuccessful sortie from Compiègne, she was captured by the Burgundians.

Through the malignity of the Bishop of Beauvais, and the perseverance of the University of Paris and the Inquisition, Joan was sold to the English for a large sum of money; and on the 3d of January, 1431, she was delivered for trial to the Inquisition, on the charge of being a heretic and a sorcerer. Her judges, with one exception French priests and prelates, condemned her to death. She was pardoned May 24; but having been induced by her keepers to resume her male attire, she was deemed to have relapsed; and May 30, 1431, she was burned alive in the market-place of Rouen.

By a decree of the pope, July 7, 1456, her sentence was revoked; and since that time Catholic writers have maintained the genuineness of her divine inspiration.

A monument to her memory marks the spot where she was burned, and an equestrian statue has been erected to her memory in Paris.

Joan of Arc was one of many persons, such, for instance, as Savonarola, who have claimed to receive supernatural aid through visible and audible means. That she was honest in this belief there can be no doubt. In her dungeon, but a short time before her execution, she said, "Yes, I have seen these apparitions clearly, as clearly as I have seen the rush of battle and the gleam of sword and spear." And in the midst of the flames which destroyed her young body, she exclaimed, "Yes, my voices were from God; they have not deceived me!"

Neither can a shadow of suspicion rest upon the purity of her life and the integrity of her purpose. Nothing swerved her from the great object of her life. The pleasures of the French court she despised; and the ennobling of her family under the name of du Lis seemed to her, peasant girl as she was, but a bauble.

Her success in arms was probably due to the enthusiasm ✓ which she roused in the French soldiery, who were fully persuaded of the truth of her claims to divine inspiration and leadership. The success of the loyal French under her generalship (if such a term can properly be applied to her enthusiastic and dogged fighting) is astonishing. Joan marched from Blois to Orleans with the relieving army, April 25; and on July 16, less than three months, Charles was crowned at Rheims. That the English recognized Joan as the cause of the turn in their fortunes is known from contemporary writers. The Duke of Bedford thus writes to his nephew, Henry VI. :—

"And alle thing there prospered for you til the tyme of the Siege of Orleans, taken in hand God knoweth by what advis.

"At the which tyme, after the adventure fallen to the persone of my cousin of Salisbury [Salisbury was killed by a cannonball during the siege], whom God assoille, there felle, by the hand of God as it seemeth, a great strook upon your people that was assembled there in grete nombre, caused in grete partie, as y trowe, of lakke of sad beleve, and of unlevefulle doubte, that thei hadde of a deciple and lyme of the Feende, called the Pucelle, that used fals enchantments and sorcerie.

“The whiche strooke and discomfiture nott oonly lessed in grete partie the nombre of your people there, but as well withdrew the courage of the remenant in merveillous wyse, and couraiged your adverse partie and ennemys to assemble them forthwith in grete nombre.”

In fact, the siege of Orleans was the turning-point of English dominion in France. From that time they continually lost ground, until, in 1452, of all their extensive possessions, only Calais remained. ✓

The life of Joan of Arc, whom the English historian Green (J. R.) describes as “the one pure figure which rises out of the greed, the lust, the selfishness, and unbelief of the time,” has been written many times in various languages. The principal lives in English are by Harriet Parr (1866), Mrs. Bray (1874), and Janet Tuckey (1880). The article in the Encyclopædia Britannica, ninth edition, is brief and pointed. See also Michelet's and Kitchin's Histories of France: also Creasy's “Fifteen Decisive Battles,” and Hallam's “Middle Ages.” The Encyclopædia Britannica says: “All previous works on Joan of Arc were deprived of a great part of their critical value by the publication, in five volumes, of the “Procès de Condamnation et de Réhabilitation de Jean d'Arc,” edited by J. Quicherat. The record of the “Procès de Condamnation” consisted originally of the official notes of the trial, afterwards edited in Latin by P. Cauchon, and bears internal marks of general truthfulness.” A French translation of the “Procès” appeared in 1868.

Joan has also been the subject of many dramas and poems, of which the principal are, Schiller's “Die Jungfrau von Orleans” and Southey's “Joan of Arc.”

SELECTIONS FROM THOMAS DE QUINCEY.

JOAN OF ARC.

IN REFERENCE TO M. MICHELET'S HISTORY OF FRANCE.

WHAT is to be thought of her? What is to be thought of the poor shepherd girl from the hills and forests of Lorraine, that — like the Hebrew shepherd boy from the hills and forests of Judea — rose suddenly out of the quiet, out of the safety, out of the religious inspiration, 5 rooted in deep pastoral solitudes, to a station in the van of armies, and to the more perilous station at the right hand of kings? The Hebrew boy inaugurated his patriotic mission by an act, by a victorious act, such as no man could deny. But so did the girl of Lorraine, if 10 we read her story as it was read by those who saw her nearest. Adverse armies bore witness to the boy as no pretender; but so they did to the gentle girl. Judged by the voice of all who saw them from a station of goodwill, both were found true and loyal to any promises in- 15 volved in their first acts. Enemies it was that made the difference between their subsequent fortunes. The boy rose to a splendor and a noonday prosperity, both personal and public, that rang through the records of his people, and became a by-word amongst his posterity for a thousand years, until the sceptre was departing from Judah. The poor, forsaken girl, on the contrary, drank not herself from that cup of rest which she had 5 secured for France. She never sang together with the songs that rose in her native Domrémy, as echoes to the departing steps of invaders. ✓ She mingled not in festal dances at Vaucouleurs which celebrated in rapture the redemption of France. No! for her voice was then

10 silent: no! for her feet were dust. Pure, innocent, noble-hearted girl! whom, from earliest youth, ever I believed in as full of truth and self-sacrifice, this was amongst the strongest pledges for thy truth, that never once — no, not for a moment of weakness — didst thou 15 revel in the vision of coronets and honor from man. Coronets for thee! Oh no! ✓ Honors, if they come when all is over, are for those that share thy blood. Daughter of Domrémy, when the gratitude of thy king shall awaken, thou wilt be sleeping the sleep of the 20 dead. Call her, King of France, but she will not hear thee! Cite her by thy apparitors to come and receive a robe of honor, but she will be found en contumace. When the thunders of universal France, as even yet may happen, shall proclaim the grandeur of the poor 25 shepherd girl that gave up all for her country, thy ear, young shepherd girl, will have been deaf for five centuries. To suffer and to do, that was thy portion in this life; that was thy destiny; and not for a moment was it hidden from thyself. Life, thou saidst, is short: and the sleep which is in the grave is long! Let me use that life, so transitory, for the glory of those heavenly dreams destined to comfort the sleep which is so long. This pure creature—pure from every suspicion of even a visionary self-interest, even as she was pure in senses more obvious—never once did this holy child, as regarded herself, relax from her belief in the darkness that was travelling to meet her. She might not prefigure the very manner of her death; she saw not in vision, perhaps, the aerial altitude of the fiery scaffold, the spectators without end on every road pouring into Rouen as to a coronation, the surging smoke, the volleying flames, the hostile faces all around, the pitying eye that lurked but here and there, until nature and imperishable truth broke loose from artificial restraints;—these might not be apparent through the mists of the hurrying future. But the voice that called her to death, that she heard forever.

Great was the throne of France even in those days, and great was he that sat upon it; but well Joanna knew that not the throne, nor he that sat upon it, was for her; but, on the contrary, that she was for them; not she by them, but they by her, should rise from the dust. Gorgeous were the lilies of France, and for centuries had the privilege to spread their beauty over land and sea, until, in another century, the wrath of God and man combined to wither them; but well Joanna knew, early at Domrémy she had read that bitter truth, that the lilies of France would decorate no garland for her. Flower nor bud, bell nor blossom, would ever bloom for her.

But stay. What reason is there for taking up this subject of Joanna precisely in the spring of 1847? Might it not have been left till the spring of 1947; or, perhaps, left till called for? Yes, but it is called for; 5 and clamorously. You are aware, reader, that amongst the many original thinkers whom modern France has produced, one of the reputed leaders is M. Michelet. All these writers are of a revolutionary cast; not in a political sense merely, but in all senses; mad, often- 10 times, as March hares; crazy with the laughing-gas of recovered liberty; drunk with the wine-cup of their mighty revolution; snorting, whinnying, throwing up their heels, like wild horses in the boundless pampas, and running races of defiance with snipes, or with the 15 winds, or with their own shadows, if they can find nothing else to challenge. Some time or other I, that have leisure to read, may introduce you, that have not, to two or three dozen of these writers; of whom I can assure you beforehand, that they are often profound, and at 20 intervals are even as impassioned as if they were come of our best English blood. But now, confining our attention to M. Michelet, we in England—who know him best by his worst book, the book against priests, etc.—know him disadvantageously. That book is a 25 rhapsody of incoherence. But his “History of France” is quite another thing. A man, in whatsoever craft he sails, cannot stretch away out of sight when he is linked to the windings of the shore by towing-ropes of history. Facts, and the consequences of facts, draw the writer back to the falconer’s lure from the giddiest heights of speculation. Here, therefore,—in his “France,”—if not always free from flightiness, if now and then off like a rocket for an airy wheel in the clouds, M. Michelet, with natural politeness, never forgets that he has left a large audience waiting for him on earth, and gazing upwards in anxiety for his return: return, therefore, he does. But history, though clear of certain temptations in one direction, has separate dangers of its own. It is impossible so to write a history of France, or of England—works becoming every hour more indispensable to the inevitably political man of this day—without perilous openings for error. If I, for instance, on the part of England, should happen to turn my labors in that channel, and (on the model of Lord Percy going to Chevy Chase)

“A vow to God should make
My pleasure in the Michelet woods Three summer days to take,”

probably, from simple delirium, I might hunt M. Michelet into delirium tremens. Two strong angels stand by the side of history, whether French history or English, as heraldic supporters: the angel of research on the left hand, that must read millions of dusty parchments, and of pages blotted with lies; the angel of meditation on the right hand, that must cleanse these lying records with fire, even as of old the draperies of asbestos were cleansed, and must quicken them into regenerated life. Willingly I acknowledge that no man will ever avoid innumerable errors of detail; with so vast a compass of ground to traverse, this is impossible; but such errors (though I have a bushel on hand, at M. Michelet's service) are not the game I chase; it is the bitter and unfair spirit in which M. Michelet writes against England. Even that, 5 after all, is but my secondary object; the real one is Joanna the Pucelle d'Orleans for herself.

I am not going to write the History of La Pucelle: to do this, or even circumstantially to report the history of her persecution and bitter death, of her struggle with 10 false witnesses and with ensnaring judges, it would be necessary to have before us all the documents, and therefore the collection only now forthcoming in Paris. But my purpose is narrower. There have been great thinkers, disdaining the careless judgments of con-
15 temporaries, who have thrown themselves boldly on the judgment of a far posterity, that should have had time to review, to ponder, to compare. There have been great actors on the stage of tragic humanity that might, with the same depth of confidence, have appealed from 20 the levity of compatriot friends — too heartless for the sublime interest of their story, and too impatient for the labor of sifting its perplexities — to the magnanimity and justice of enemies. To this class belongs the Maid of Arc. The ancient Romans were too faithful to the 25 ideal of grandeur in themselves not to relent, after a generation or two, before the grandeur of Hannibal. Mithridates — a more doubtful person — yet merely for the magic perseverance of his indomitable malice, won from the same Romans the only real honor that ever he received on earth. And we English have ever shown the same homage to stubborn enmity. To work unflinchingly for the ruin of England; to say through life, by word and by deed, Delanda est Anglia Victrix! that one purpose of malice, faithfully pursued, has quartered some people upon our national funds of homage as by a perpetual annuity. Better than an inheritance of service rendered to England herself, has sometimes proved the most insane hatred to England. Hyder Ali, even his son Tippoo, though so far inferior, and Napoleon, have all benefited by this disposition amongst ourselves to exaggerate the merit of diabolic enmity. Not one of these men was ever capable, in a solitary instance, of praising an enemy [what do you say to that, reader?], and yet in their behalf, we consent to forget, not their crimes only, but (which is worse) their hideous bigotry and anti-magnanimous egotism, for nationality it was not. Suffrein, and some half-dozen of other French nautical heroes, because rightly they did us all the mischief they could (which was really great), are names justly revered in England. On the same principle, La Pucelle d'Orleans, the victorious enemy of England, has been destined to receive her deepest commemoration from the magnanimous justice of Englishmen.

Joanna, as we in England should call her, but, according to her own statement, Jeanne (or, as M. Michelet asserts, Jean) d'Arc, was born at Domrémy, a village on the marches of Lorraine and Champagne, and dependent upon the town of Vaucouleurs. I have called her a Lorrainer, not simply because the word is prettier, but because Champagne too odiously reminds us English of what are for us imaginary wines, which, undoubtedly, La Pucelle tasted as rarely as we English; we English, because the champagne of London is chiefly grown in Devonshire; La Pucelle, because the champagne of 5 Champagne never, by any chance, flowed into the fountain of Domrémy, from which only she drank. M. Michelet will have her to be a Champenoise, and for no better reason than that she "took after her father," who happened to be a Champenois.

10 These disputes, however, turn on refinements too nice. Domrémy stood upon the frontiers, and, like other frontiers, produced a mixed race representing the cis and the trans. A river (it is true) formed the boundary-line at this point — the river Meuse; and that, in old days, 15 might have divided the populations; but in these days it did not: there were bridges, there were ferries, and weddings crossed from the right bank to the left. Here lay two great roads, not so much for travellers that were few, as for armies that were too many by half. These
20 two roads, one of which was the great highroad between France and Germany, decussated at this very point; which is a learned way of saying that they formed a St. Andrew's cross, or letter X. I hope the compositor will choose a good large X, in which case the point of 25 intersection, the locus of conflux and intersection for these four diverging arms, will finish the reader's geographical education, by showing him to a hair's-breadth where it was that Domrémy stood. Those roads, so grandly situated, as great trunk arteries between two mighty realms, and haunted forever by wars, or rumors of wars, decussated (for anything I know to the contrary) absolutely under Joanna's bedroom window; one rolling away to the right, past Monsieur d'Arc's old barn, and the other unaccountably preferring to sweep round that odious man's pig-sty to the left. 5

On whichever side of the border chance had thrown Joanna, the same love to France would have been nurtured. For it is a strange fact, noticed by M. Michelet and others, that the Dukes of Bar and Lorraine had for generations pursued the policy of eternal warfare with 10 France on their own account, yet also of eternal amity and league with France in case anybody else presumed to attack her. Let peace settle upon France, and before long you might rely upon seeing the little vixen Lorraine flying at the throat of France. Let France be assailed 15 by a formidable enemy, and instantly you saw a duke of Lorraine insisting on having his own throat cut in support of France; which favor accordingly was cheerfully granted to him in three great successive battles — twice by the English, viz., at Crécy and Agincourt, once 20 by the Sultan at Nicopolis.

This sympathy with France during great eclipses, in those that during ordinary seasons were always teasing her with brawls and guerilla inroads, strengthened the natural piety to France of those that were confessedly 25 the children of her own house. The outposts of France, as one may call the great frontier provinces, were of all localities the most devoted to the Fleurs de Lis. To witness, at any great crisis, the generous devotion to these lilies of the little fiery cousin that in gentler weather was forever tilting at the breast of France, could not but fan the zeal of France's legitimate daughters: whilst to occupy a post of honor on the frontiers against an old hereditary enemy of France, would naturally stimulate this zeal by a sentiment of martial pride, by a sense of danger always threatening, and of hatred always smouldering. That great four-headed road was a perpetual memento to patriotic ardor. To say, this way lies the road to Paris, and that other way to Aix-la-Chapelle, this to Prague, that to Vienna, nourished the warfare of the heart by daily ministrations of sense. The eye that watched for the gleams of lance or helmet from the hostile frontier, the ear that listened for the groaning of wheels, made the high-road itself, with its relations to centres so remote, into a manual of patriotic duty.

✓ The situation, therefore, locally, of Joanna was full of profound suggestions to a heart that listened for the stealthy steps of change and fear that too surely were in motion. But, if the place were grand, the time, the burden of the time, was far more so. The air overhead in its upper chambers was hurtling with the obscure sound; was dark with sullen fermenting of storms that had been gathering for a hundred and thirty years. The battle of Agincourt, in Joanna's childhood, had reopened the wounds of France. Crécy and Poitiers, those withering overthrows for the chivalry of France, had, before Agincourt occurred, been tranquillized by more than half a century; but this resurrection of their trumpet wails made the whole series of battles and endless skirmishes take their stations as parts in one drama. The graves that had closed sixty years ago, seemed to fly open in sympathy with a sorrow that echoed their own. The monarchy of France labored in extremity, rocked and reeled like a ship fighting with the darkness 5 of monsoons. The madness of the poor king (Charles VI.) falling in at such a crisis, like the case of women laboring in childbirth during the storming of a city, trebled the awfulness of the time. Even the wild story of the incident which had immediately occasioned 10 the explosion of this madness—the case of a man unknown, gloomy, and perhaps maniacal himself, coming out of a forest at noonday, laying his hand upon the bridle of the king's horse, checking him for a moment to say, 'O king, thou art betrayed,' and then vanishing, no 15 man knew whither, as he had appeared for no man knew what—fell in with the universal prostration of mind that laid France on her knees, as before the slow unweaving of some ancient prophetic doom. The famines, the extraordinary diseases, the insurrections of the 20 peasantry up and down Europe—these were chords struck from the same mysterious harp; but these were transitory chords. There have been others of deeper and more ominous sound. The termination of the Crusades, the destruction of the Templars, the Papal 25 interdicts, the tragedies caused or suffered by the house of Anjou, and by the emperor,—these were full of a more permanent significance. But, since then, the colossal figure of feudalism was seen standing, as it were, on tiptoe, at Crécy, for flight from earth; that was

- a revolution unparalleled; yet that was a trifle, by comparison with the more fearful revolutions that were mining below the Church. By her own internal schisms, by the abominable spectacle of a double pope — so that
- 5 no man, except through political bias, could even guess which was Heaven's vicegerent, and which the creature of hell — the Church was rehearsing, as in still earlier forms she had already rehearsed, those vast rents in her foundations which no man should ever heal.
- 10 These were the loftiest peaks of the cloudland in the skies, that to the scientific gazer first caught the colors of the new morning in advance. But the whole vast range alike of sweeping glooms overhead, dwelt upon all meditative minds, even upon those that could not distinguish
- 15 the tendencies nor decipher the forms. It was, therefore, not her own age alone, as affected by its immediate calamities, that lay with such weight upon Joanna's mind; but her own age, as one section in a vast mysterious drama, unweaving through a century back, and
- 20 drawing nearer continually to some dreadful crisis. Cataracts and rapids were heard roaring ahead; and signs were seen far back, by help of old men's memories, which answered secretly to signs now coming forward on the eye, even as locks answer to keys. It was not
- 25 wonderful that in such a haunted solitude, with such a haunted heart, Joanna should see angelic visions and hear angelic voices. These voices whispered to her forever the duty, self imposed, of delivering France. Five years she listened to these monitory voices with internal struggles. At length she could resist no longer. Doubt gave way; and she left her home forever in order to present herself at the dauphin's court.

The education of this poor girl was mean, according to the present standard: was ineffably grand, according to a purer philosophic standard: and only not good for our age because for us it would be unattainable. She read nothing, for she could not read; but she had heard others read parts of the Roman martyrology. She wept in sympathy with the sad Misereres of the Romish Church; she rose to heaven with the glad triumphant Te Deums of Rome: she drew her comfort and her vital strength from the rites of the same Church. But, next after these spiritual advantages, she owed most to the advantages of her situation. The fountain of Domrémy was on the brink of a boundless forest; and it was haunted to that degree by fairies that the parish priest (cure) was obliged to read mass there once a year, in order to keep them in any decent bounds. Fairies are important, even in a statistical view: certain weeds mark poverty in the soil, fairies mark its solitude. As surely as the wolf retires before cities, does the fairy sequester herself from the haunts of the licensed victualler. A village is too much for her nervous delicacy: at most, she can tolerate a distant view of a hamlet. We may judge, therefore, by the uneasiness and extra trouble which they gave to the parson, in what strength the fairies mustered at Domrémy; and, by a satisfactory consequence, how thinly sown with men and women must have been that region even in its inhabited spots. But the forests of Domrémy — those were the glories of the land: for in them abode mysterious power and ancient secrets that towered into tragic strength. "Abbeys there were, and abbey windows," — "like Moorish temples of the Hindoos," that exercised even princely 5 power both in Lorraine and in the German Diets. These had their sweet bells that pierced the forest for many a league at matins or vespers, and each its own dreamy legend. Few enough, and scattered enough, were these abbeys, so as in no degree to disturb the deep solitude

10 of the region; yet many enough to spread a network or awning of Christian sanctity over what else might have seemed a heathen wilderness. This sort of religious talisman being secured, a man the most afraid of ghosts (like myself, suppose, or the reader) becomes armed 15 into courage to wander for days in their sylvan recesses. The mountains of the Vosges, on the eastern frontier of France, have never attracted much notice from Europe, except in 1813–14 for a few brief months, when they fell within Napoleon's line of defence against the Allies. But 20 they are interesting for this, amongst other features, that they do not, like some loftier ranges, repel woods: the forests and the hills are on sociable terms. Live and let live is their motto. For this reason, in part, these tracts in Lorraine were a favorite hunting-ground with 25 the Carlovingian princes. About six hundred years before Joanna's childhood, Charlemagne was known to have hunted there. That, of itself, was a grand incident in the traditions of a forest or a chase. In these vast forests, also, were to be found (if anywhere to be found) those mysterious fawns that tempted solitary hunters into visionary and perilous pursuits. Here was seen (if anywhere seen) that ancient stag who was already nine hundred years old, but possibly a hundred or two more, when met by Charlemagne; and the thing was put beyond doubt by the inscription upon his golden collar. 5 I believe Charlemagne knighted the stag; and, if ever he is met again by a king, he ought to be made an earl — or, being upon the marches of France, a marquis. Observe, I don't absolutely vouch for all these things: my own opinion varies. On a fine breezy forenoon I am auda- 10 ciously sceptical; but, as twilight sets in, my credulity grows steadily, till it becomes equal to anything that could be desired. And I have heard candid sportsmen declare that, outside of these very forests, they laughed loudly at all the dim tales connected with their haunted 15 solitude; but, on reaching a spot notoriously eighteen miles deep within them, they agreed with Sir Roger de Coverley, that a good deal might be said on both sides.

Such traditions, or any others that (like the stag) connect distant generations with each other, are, for that 20 cause, sublime; and the sense of the shadowy, connected with such appearances that reveal themselves or not according to circumstances, leaves a coloring of sanctity over ancient forests, even in those minds that utterly reject the legend as a fact. 25

4 But, apart from all distinct stories of that order, in any solitary frontier between two great empires, as here, for instance, or in the desert between Syria and the Euphrates, there is an inevitable tendency in minds of any deep sensibility, to people the solitudes with phan-

✓ tom images of powers that were of old so vast. Joanna, therefore, in her quiet occupation of a shepherdess, would be led continually to brood over the political condition ✓ of her country, by the traditions of the past no less
5 than by the mementoes of the local present.

M. Michelet, indeed, says that La Pucelle was not a shepherdess. I beg his pardon: she was. What he rests upon, I guess pretty well: it is the evidence of a woman called Haumette, the most confidential friend of 10 Joanna. Now, she is a good witness, and a good girl, and I like her; for she makes a natural and affectionate report of Joanna's ordinary life. But still, however good she may be as a witness, Joanna is better; and she, when speaking to the dauphin, calls herself in the Latin
15 report Bergereta. Even Haumette confesses that Joanna tended sheep in her girlhood. And I believe that if Miss Haumette were taking coffee alone with me this very evening (February 12, 1847)—in which there would be no subject for scandal or for maiden blushes,
20 because I am an intense philosopher, and Miss H. would be hard upon four hundred and fifty years—she would admit the following comment upon her evidence to be right. A Frenchman, about forty years ago, M. Simond, in his "Travels," mentions incidentally the following 25 hideous scene as one steadily observed and watched by himself, in chivalrous France, not very long before the French Revolution: A peasant was ploughing; the team that drew his plough was a donkey and a woman. Both were regularly harnessed: both pulled alike. This is bad enough; but the Frenchman adds that, in distributing his lashes, the peasant was obviously desirous of being impartial; or, if either the yoke fellows had a right to complain, certainly it was not the donkey. Now, in any country where such degradation of females could be tolerated by the state of manners, a woman of delicacy would shrink from acknowledging, either for herself or her friend, that she had ever been addicted to any mode of labor not strictly domestic; because, if once owning herself a prædial servant, she would be sensible that this confession extended by probability in the hearer's thoughts to the having incurred indignities of this horrible kind. Haumette clearly thinks it more dignified for Joanna to have been darning the stockings of her horny-hoofed father, Monsieur d'Arc, than keeping sheep, lest she might then be suspected of having ever done something worse. But, luckily, there was no danger of that: Joanna never was in service; and my opinion is that her father should have mended his own stockings, since probably he was the party to make holes in them, as many a better man than d'Arc does; meaning by that not myself, because, though probably a better man than d'Arc, I protest against doing anything of the kind. If I lived even with Friday in Juan Fernandez, either Friday must do all the darning, or else it must go undone. The better men that I meant were the sailors in the British navy, every man of whom mends his own stockings. Who else is to do it? Do you suppose, reader, that the junior lords of the admiralty are under articles to darn for the navy?

The reason, meantime, for my systematic hatred of d'Arc is this: There was a story current in France before the Revolution, framed to ridicule the pauper aristocracy, who happened to have long pedigrees and short rent rolls; viz., that a head of such a house, dating from 5 the Crusades, was overheard saying to his son, a Chevalier of St. Louis, "Chevalier, as-tu donné au cochon à manger?" Now, it is clearly made out by the surviving evidence that d'Arc would much have preferred continuing to say, "Ma fille, as-tu donné au cochon à manger?"

10 to saying, "Pucelle d'Orleans, as-tu sauvé les fleurs-de-lis?" There is an old English copy of verses which argues thus:—

“If the man that turnips cries
Cry not when his father dies—
Then 'tis plain the man had rather Have a turnip than his father.”

I cannot say that the logic in these verses was ever entirely to my satisfaction. I do not see my way through 15 it as clearly as could be wished. But I see my way more clearly through d'Arc; and the result is—that he would greatly have preferred not merely a turnip to his father, but saving a pound or so of bacon to saving the Oriflamme of France.

20 It is probable (as M. Michelet suggests) that the title of Virgin, or Pucelle, had in itself, and apart from the miraculous stories about her, a secret power over the rude soldiery and partisan chiefs of that period; for, in such a person, they saw a representative manifestation of the Virgin Mary, who in a course of centuries, had grown steadily upon the popular heart. ✓

As to Joanna's supernatural detection of the dauphin (Charles VII.) amongst three hundred lords and knights, I am surprised at the credulity which could ever lend 5 itself to that theatrical juggle. Who admires more than myself the sublime enthusiasm, the rapturous faith in herself, of this pure creature? But I am far from admiring stage artifices, which not La Pucelle, but the court, must have arranged; nor can I surrender myself 10 to the conjurer's legerdemain, such as may be seen every day for a shilling. Southey's "Joan of Arc" was published in 1796. Twenty years after, talking with Southey, I was surprised to find him still owning a secret bias in favor of Joan, founded on her detection of the 15 dauphin. The story, for the benefit of the reader new to the case, was this: La Pucelle was first made known to the dauphin, and presented to his court, at Chinon: and here came her first trial. By way of testing her supernatural pretensions, she was to find out the royal 20 personage amongst the whole ark of clean and unclean creatures. Failing in this coup d'essai, she would not simply disappoint many a beating heart in the glittering crowd that on different motives yearned for her success, but she would ruin herself—and, as the oracle within 25 had told her, would, by ruining herself, ruin France. Our own sovereign lady Victoria rehearses annually a trial not so severe in degree, but the same in kind. She "pricks" for sheriffs. Joanna pricked for a king. But observe the difference: our own lady pricks for two men out of three; Joanna for one man out of three hundred. Happy Lady of the islands and the orient! — she can go astray in her choice only by one half; to the extent of one half she must have the satisfaction of 5 being right. And yet, even with these tight limits to the misery of a boundless discretion, permit me, liege Lady, with all loyalty, to submit — that now and then you prick with your pin the wrong man. But the poor child from Domrémy, shrinking under the gaze of a

10 dazzling court — not because dazzling (for in visions she had seen those that were more so), but because some of them wore a scoffing smile on their features — how should she throw her line into so deep a river to angle for a king, where many a gay creature was sporting that 15 masqueraded as kings in dress? Nay, even more than any true king would have done: for, in Southey's version of the story, the dauphin says, by way of trying the virgin's magnetic sympathy with royalty, —

“On the throne,
I the while mingling with the menial throng,
Some courtier shall be seated.”

This usurper is even crowned: “the jewelled crown 20 shines on a menial's head.” But, really, that is “un peu fort ;” and the mob of spectators might raise a scruple whether our friend the jackdaw upon the throne, and the dauphin himself, were not grazing the shins of treason. For the dauphin could not lend more than 25 belonged to him. According to the popular notion, he had no crown for himself; consequently none to lend,

on any pretense whatever, until the consecrated Maid should take him to Rheims. This was the popular notion in France. But, certainly, it was the dauphin's interest to support the popular notion, as he meant to use the services of Joanna. For, if he were king already, 5 what was it that she could do for him beyond Orleans? That is to say, what more than a mere military service could she render him? And, above all, if he were king without a coronation, and without the oil from the sacred ampulla, what advantage was yet open to him by 10 celerity above his competitor the English boy? Now was to be a race for a coronation: he that should win that race, carried the superstition of France along with him: he that should first be drawn from the ovens of Rheims, was under that superstition baked into a king. 15

La Pucelle, before she could be allowed to practise as a warrior, was put through her manual and platoon exercise, as a pupil in divinity, at the bar of six eminent men in wigs. According to Southey (v. 393, Book III., in the original edition of his "Joan of Arc"), she 20 "appalled the doctors." It's not easy to do that: but they had some reason to feel bothered, as that surgeon would assuredly feel bothered, who, upon proceeding to dissect a subject, should find the subject retaliating as a dissector upon himself, especially if Joanna ever made the 25 speech to them which occupies v. 354-391, B. III. It is a double impossibility: 1st, because a piracy from Tindal's "Christianity as Old as the Creation"—a piracy à parte ante, and by three centuries; 2ly, it is quite contrary to the evidence on Joanna's trial. Southey's carith ✓ "Joan," of A.D. 1796 (Cottle, Bristol), tells the doctors, among other secrets, that she never in her life attended — 1st, Mass; nor 2d, the Sacramental table; nor 3d, Confession. In the mean time, all this deistical confession of Joanna's, besides being suicidal for the interest of her cause, is opposed to the depositions upon both trials. The very best witness called from first to last deposes that Joanna attended these rites of her Church even too often; was taxed with doing so; and, by blushing, owned the charge as a fact, though certainly not as a fault. Joanna was a girl of natural piety, that saw God in forests, and hills, and fountains; but did not the less seek him in chapels and consecrated oratories.

This peasant girl was self-educated through her own natural meditateness. If the reader turns to that divine passage in "Paradise Regained," which Milton has put into the mouth of our Saviour when first entering the wilderness, and musing upon the tendency of those great impulses growing within himself, —

"Oh, what a multitude of thoughts at once Awaken'd in me swarm, while I consider
What from within I feel myself, and hear
What from without comes often to my ears,
Ill sorting with my present state compar'd !
When I was yet a child, no childish play
To me was pleasing ; all my mind was set
Serious to learn and know, and thence to do
What might be public good ; myself I thought Born to that end " — he will have some notion of the vast reveries which brooded over the heart of Joanna in early girlhood, when the wings were budding that should carry her from Orleans to Rheims ; when the golden chariot was dimly revealing itself, that should carry her from the kingdom of France Delivered to the eternal kingdom.

It is not requisite, for the honor of Joanna, nor is 5 there, in this place, room to pursue her brief career of action. That, though wonderful, forms the earthly part of her story : the spiritual part is the saintly passion of her imprisonment, trial, and execution. It is unfortunate, therefore, for Southey's "Joan of Arc" (which, 10 however, should always be regarded as a juvenile effort), that, precisely when her real glory begins, the poem ends. But this limitation of the interest grew, no doubt, from the constraint inseparably attached to the law of epic unity. Joanna's history bisects into two opposite 15 hemispheres, and both could not have been presented to the eye in one poem, unless by sacrificing all unity of theme, or else by involving the earlier half, as a narrative episode, in the latter ; which, however, might have been done, for it might have been communicated to a 20 fellow-prisoner, or a confessor, by Joanna herself. It is sufficient, as concerns this section of Joanna's life, to say that she fulfilled, to the height of her promises, the restoration of the prostrate throne. France had become a province of England ; and for the ruin of both, if such 25 a yoke could be maintained. Dreadful pecuniary exhaustion caused the English energy to droop ; and that critical opening La Pucelle used with a corresponding felicity of audacity and suddenness (that were in themselves portentous) for introducing the wedge of French native resources, for rekindling the national pride, and for planting the dauphin once more upon his feet. When Joanna appeared, he had been on the point of giving up the struggle with the English, distressed as they were, and of flying to the south of France. She taught him to blush for such abject counsels. She liberated Orleans, that great city, so decisive by its fate for the issue of the war, and then beleaguered by the English with an elaborate application of engineering skill unprecedented in Europe. Entering the city after sunset, on the 29th of April, she sang mass on Sunday, May 8, for the entire disappearance of the besieging force. On the 29th of June, she fought and gained over the English the decisive battle of Patay; on the 9th of July, she took Troyes by a coup-de-main from a mixed garrison of English and Burgundians; on the 15th of that month, she carried the dauphin into Rheims; on Sunday the 17th, she crowned him; and there she rested from her labor of triumph. All that was to be done she had now accomplished: what remained was — to suffer.

All this forward movement was her own: excepting one man, the whole council was against her. Her enemies were all that drew power from earth. Her supporters were her own strong enthusiasm, and the headlong contagion by which she carried this sublime frenzy into the hearts of women, of soldiers, and of all who lived by labor. Henceforwards she was thwarted; and the worst error she committed was, to lend the sanction of her presence to counsels which she had ceased to approve. But she had now accomplished the capital objects which her own visions had dictated. These involved all the rest. Errors were now less important; and doubtless it had now become more difficult for herself to pronounce authentically what were errors. The noble girl had achieved, as by a rapture of motion, the capital end of clearing out a free space around her sovereign, giving him the power to move his arms with effect; and, secondly, the inappreciable end of winning for that sovereign what seemed to all France the heavenly ratification of his rights, by crowning him with the ancient solemnities. She had made it impossible for the English now to step before her. They were caught in an irretrievable blunder, owing partly to discord amongst the uncles of Henry VI., partly to a want of funds, but partly to the very impossibility which they believed to press with tenfold force upon any French attempt to forestall theirs. They laughed at such a thought; and whilst they laughed, she did it. Henceforth the single redress for the English of this capital oversight, but which never could have redressed it effectually, was, to vitiate and taint the coronation of Charles VII. as the work of a witch. That policy, and not malice (as M. Michelet is so happy to believe), was the moving principle in the subsequent prosecution of Joanna. Unless they unhinged the force of the first coronation in the popular mind, by associating it with power given from hell, they felt that the sceptre of the invader was broken.

But she, the child that, at nineteen, had wrought wonders so great for France, was she not elated? Did she not lose, as men so often have lost, all sobriety of mind when standing upon the pinnacle of success so giddy !

Let her enemies declare. During the progress of her movement, and in the centre of ferocious struggles, she had manifested the temper of her feelings, by the pity 5 which she had everywhere expressed for the suffering enemy. She forwarded to the English leaders a touching invitation to unite with the French, as brothers, in a common crusade against infidels, thus opening the road for a soldierly retreat. She interposed to protect the 10 captive or the wounded — she mourned over the excesses of her countrymen — she threw herself off her horse to kneel by the dying English soldier, and to comfort him with such ministrations, physical or spiritual, as his situation allowed. Nolebat, says the evidence, uti 15 ense suo, aut quemquam interficere. She sheltered the English, that invoked her aid, in her own quarters.
She wept as she beheld, stretched on the field of battle,
so many brave enemies that had died without confession.
And, as regarded herself, her elation expressed itself 20 thus : — On the day when she had finished her work, she wept ; for she knew that, when her triumphal task was done, her end must be approaching. Her aspirations pointed only to a place, which seemed to her more than usually full of natural piety, as one in which it would 25 give her pleasure to die. And she uttered, between smiles and tears, as a wish that inexpressibly fascinated her heart, and yet was half-fantastic, a broken prayer, that God would return her to the solitudes from which he had drawn her, and suffer her to become a shepherdess once more. It was a natural prayer, because nature has laid a necessity upon every human heart to seek for rest, and to shrink from torment. Yet, again, it was a half-fantastic prayer, because, from childhood upwards, visions that she had no power to mistrust, and the voices which sounded in her ear forever, had long since 5 persuaded her mind, that for her no such prayer could be granted. Too well she felt that her mission must be worked out to the end, and that the end was now at hand. All went wrong from this time. She herself had created the funds out of which the French restoration 10 should grow; but she was not suffered to witness their development, or their prosperous application. More than one military plan was entered upon which she did not approve. But she still continued to expose her person as before. Severe wounds had not taught her caution. 15 And at length, in a sortie from Compeigne (whether through treacherous collusion on the part of her own friends is doubtful to this day), she was made prisoner by the Burgundians, and finally surrendered to the English.

✓ Now came her trial. This trial, moving of course under English influence, was conducted in chief by the Bishop of Beauvais. He was a Frenchman, sold to English interests, and hoping, by favor of the English leaders, to reach the highest preferment. Bishop that 25 art, Archbishop that shalt be, Cardinal that mayest be, were the words that sounded continually in his ear; and doubtless, a whisper of visions still higher, of a triple crown, and feet upon the necks of kings, sometimes stole into his heart. M. Michelet is anxious to keep us in mind that this bishop was but an agent of the English. True. But it does not better the case for his countryman — that, being an accomplice in the crime, making himself a leader in the persecution against the helpless

5 girl, he was willing to be all this in the spirit, and with the conscious vileness of a cat's-paw. Never from the foundations of the earth was there such a trial as this, if it were laid open in all its beauty of defence, and all its hellishness of attack. Oh, child of France! shep-
10 herdess, peasant girl! trodden under foot by all around thee, how I honor thy flashing intellect, quick as God's lightning, and true as God's lightning, to its mark, that ran before France and laggard Europe by many a century, confounding the malice of the ensnarer,
15 and making dumb the oracles of falsehood! Is it not scandalous, is it not humiliating to civilization, that, even at this day, France exhibits the horrid spectacle of judges examining the prisoner against himself; seducing himself, by fraud, into treacherous conclusions
20 against his own head; using the terrors of their power for extorting confessions from the frailty of hope; nay (which is worse), using the blandishments of condescension and snaky kindness for thawing into compliances of gratitude those whom they had failed to 25 freeze into terror? Wicked judges! Barbarian jurisprudence! that, sitting in your own conceit on the summits of social wisdom, have yet failed to learn the first principles of criminal justice; sit ye humbly and with docility at the feet of this girl from Domrémy, that tore your webs of cruelty into shreds and dust.

"Would you examine me as a witness against myself?" was a question by which many times she defied their arts. Continually she showed that their interrogations were irrelevant to any business before the court, or that entered into the ridiculous charges against her. General 5 questions were proposed to her on points of casuistical divinity; two-edged questions, which not one of themselves could have answered without, on the one side, landing himself in heresy (as then interpreted), or, on the other, in some presumptuous expression of self- 10 esteem. Next came a wretched Dominican, that pressed her with an objection, which, if applied to the Bible would tax every one of its miracles with unsoundness. The monk had the excuse of never having read the Bible. M. Michelet has no such excuse; and it makes 15 one blush for him, as a philosopher, to find him describing such an argument as "weighty," whereas it is but a varied expression of rude Mahometan metaphysics. Her answer to this, if there were room to place the whole in a clear light, was as shattering as it was rapid. 20 Another thought to entrap her by asking what language the angelic visitors of her solitude had talked; as though heavenly counsels could want polyglot interpreters for every word, or that God needed language at all in whispering thoughts to a human heart. Then came a worse 25 devil, who asked her whether the archangel Michael had appeared naked. Not comprehending the vile insinuation, Joanna, whose poverty suggested to her simplicity that it might be the costliness of suitable robes which caused the demur, asked them if they fancied

God, who clothed the flowers of the valleys, unable to find raiment for his servants. The answer of Joanna moves a smile of tenderness, but the disappointment of her judges makes one laugh exultingly. Others succeeded by troops, who upbraided her with leaving her father; as if that greater Father, whom she believed herself to have been serving, did not retain the power of dispensing with his own rules, or had not said, that, for a less cause than martyrdom, man and woman should leave both father and mother.

On Easter Sunday, when the trial had been long proceeding, the poor girl fell so ill as to cause a belief that she had been poisoned. It was not poison. Nobody had any interest in hastening a death so certain. M. Michel, whose sympathies with all feelings are so quick that one would gladly see them always as justly directed, reads the case most truly. Joanna had a twofold malady. She was visited by a paroxysm of the complaint called homesickness; the cruel nature of her imprisonment, and its length, could not but point her solitary thoughts, in darkness and in chains (for chained she was), to Domrémy. And the season, which was the most heavenly period of the spring, added stings to this yearning. This was one of her maladies — nostalgia, as medicine calls it; the other was weariness and exhaustion from daily combats with malice. She saw that everybody hated her, and thirsted for her blood; nay, many kind-hearted creatures that would have pitied her profoundly, as regarded all political charges, had their natural feelings warped by the belief that she had dealings with fiendish powers. She knew she was to die; that was not the misery: the misery was that this consummation could not be reached without so much intermediate strife, as if she were contending for some chance (where chance was none) of happiness, or were dreaming for a moment 5 of escaping the inevitable. Why, then, did she contend? Knowing that she would reap nothing from answering her persecutors, why did she not retire by silence from the superfluous contest? It was because her quick and eager loyalty to truth would not suffer her to see it dark- 10 ened by frauds, which she could expose, but others, even of candid listeners, perhaps could not; it was through that imperishable grandeur of soul, which taught her to submit meekly and without a struggle to her punishment, but taught her not to submit — no, not for a moment — 15 to calumny as to facts, or to misconstruction as to motives. Besides, there were secretaries all around the court taking down her words. That was meant for no good to her. But the end does not always correspond to the meaning. And Joanna might say to herself: These 20 words that will be used against me to-morrow and the next day, perhaps in some nobler generation may rise again for my justification. Yes, Joanna, they are rising even now in Paris, and for more than justification.

Woman, sister — there are some things which you do 25 not execute as well as your brother, man; no, nor ever will. Pardon me, if I doubt whether you will ever produce a great poet from your choirs, or a Mozart, or a Phidias, or a Michael Angelo, or a great philosopher, or a great scholar. By which last is meant — not one who depends simply on an infinite memory, but also on an infinite and electrical power of combination; bringing together from the four winds, like the angel of the resurrection, what else were dust from dead men's bones, 5 into the unity of breathing life. If you can create yourselves into any of these great creators, why have you not?

Yet, sister, woman, though I cannot consent to find a Mozart or a Michael Angelo in your sex, cheerfully, and 10 with the love that burns in depths of admiration, I acknowledge that you can do one thing as well as the best of us men—a greater thing than even Milton is known to have done, or Michael Angelo—you can die grandly, and as goddesses would die, were goddesses mortal. If 15 any distant worlds (which may be the case) are so far ahead of us Tellurians in optical resources, as to see distinctly through their telescopes all that we do on earth, what is the grandest sight to which we ever treat them? St. Peter's at Rome, do you fancy, on Easter Sunday, or 20 Luxor, or perhaps the Himalayas? Oh, no! my friend: suggest something better; these are baubles to them; they see in other worlds, in their own, far better toys of the same kind. These, take my word for it, are nothing. Do you give it up? The finest thing, then, we have to 25 show them, is a scaffold on the morning of execution. I assure you there is a strong muster in those far telescopic worlds, on any such morning, of those who happen to find themselves occupying the right hemisphere for a peep at us. How, then, if it be announced in some such telescopic world by those who make a livelihood of catching glimpses at our newspapers, whose language they have long since deciphered, that the poor victim in the morning's sacrifice is a woman? How, if it be published in that distant world, that the sufferer wears upon her head, in the eyes of many, the garlands of martyr- 5 dom? How, if it should be some Marie Antoinette, the widowed queen, coming forward on the scaffold, and presenting to the morning air her head turned gray by sorrow, daughter of Cæsars kneeling down humbly to kiss the guillotine, as one that worships death? How, 10 if it were the noble Charlotte Corday, that in the bloom of youth, that with the loveliest of persons, that with homage waiting upon her smiles wherever she turned her face to scatter them — homage that followed those smiles as surely as the carols of birds, after showers in spring, 15 follow the reappearing sun and the racing of sunbeams over the hills — yet thought all these things cheaper than the dust upon her sandals, in comparison of deliverance from hell for her dear suffering France! Ah! these were spectacles indeed for those sympathizing people in 20 distant worlds; and some perhaps would suffer a sort of martyrdom themselves, because they could not testify their wrath, could not bear witness to the strength of love and to the fury of hatred that burned within them at such scenes; could not gather into golden urns some 25 of that glorious dust which rested in the catacombs of earth.

On the Wednesday after Trinity Sunday in 1431, being then about nineteen years of age, the Maid of Arc underwent her martyrdom. She was conducted before midday, guarded by eight hundred spearmen, to a platform of prodigious height, constructed of wooden billets supported by occasional walls of lath and plaster, and traversed by hollow spaces in every direction for the 5 creation of air-currents. The pile "struck terror," says M. Michelet, "by its height;" and, as usual, the English purpose in this is viewed as one of pure malignity. But there are two ways of explaining all that. It is probable that the purpose was merciful. On the circumstances of 10 the execution I shall not linger. Yet, to mark the almost fatal felicity of M. Michelet in finding out whatever may injure the English name, at a moment when every reader will be interested in Joanna's personal appearance, it is really edifying to notice the ingenuity

15 by which he draws into light from a dark corner a very unjust account of it, and neglects, though lying upon the high-road, a very pleasing one. Both are from English pens. Grafton, a chronicler but little read, being a stiff-necked John Bull, thought fit to say that
20 no wonder Joanna should be a virgin, since her "foule face" was a satisfactory solution of that particular merit. Holinshead, on the other hand, a chronicler somewhat later, every way more important, and at one time universally read, has given a very pleasing testimony
25 mony to the interesting character of Joanna's person and engaging manners. Neither of these men lived till the following century, so that personally this evidence is none at all. Grafton sullenly and carelessly believed as he wished to believe; Holinshead took pains to inquire, and reports undoubtedly the general impression of France. But I cite the case as illustrating M. Michelet's candor.

The circumstantial incidents of the execution, unless with more space than I can now command, I should be unwilling to relate. I should fear to injure, by imperfect report, a martyrdom which to myself appears so unspeakably grand. Yet for a purpose, pointing not at Joanna, but M. Michelet, — viz., to convince him that an Englishman is capable of thinking more highly of La Pucelle than even her admiring countryman, — I shall, in parting, allude to one or two traits in Joanna's demeanor on the scaffold, and to one or two in that of the bystanders, which authorize me in questioning an opinion of his upon this martyr's firmness. The reader ought to be reminded that Joanna d'Arc was subjected to an unusually unfair trial of opinion. Any of the elder Christian martyrs had not much to fear of personal rancor. The martyr was chiefly regarded as the enemy of Cæsar; at times, also, where any knowledge of the Christian faith and morals existed, with the enmity that arises spontaneously in the worldly against the spiritual. But the martyr, though disloyal, was not supposed to be, therefore, anti-national; and still less was individually hateful. What was hated (if anything) belonged to his class, not to himself separately. Now, Joanna, if hated at all, was hated personally, and in Rouen on national grounds. Hence there would be a certainty of calumny arising against her, such as would not affect martyrs in general. That being the case, it would follow of necessity that some people would im-pute to her a willingness to recant. No innocence could escape that. Now, had she really testified this willingness on the scaffold, it would have argued nothing at all but the weakness of a genial nature shrinking from the 5 instant approach of torment. And those will often pity that weakness most, who, in their own persons, would yield to it least. Meantime, there never was a calumny uttered that drew less support from the recorded circumstances. It rests upon no positive testimony, and it

10 has a weight of contradicting testimony to stem. And yet, strange to say, M. Michelet, who at times seems to admire the Maid of Arc as much as I do, is the one sole writer amongst her friends who lends some countenance to this odious slander. His words are that, if she did
15 not utter this word recant with her lips, she uttered it in her heart. "Whether she said the word is uncertain; but I affirm that she thought it."

Now, I affirm that she did not; not in any sense of the word "thought" applicable to the case. Here is 20 France calumniating La Pucelle: here is England defending her. M. Michelet can only mean that, on à priori principles, every woman must be liable to such a weakness: that Joanna was a woman; ergo, that she was liable to such a weakness. That is, he only sup-
25 poses her to have uttered the word by an argument which presumes it impossible for anybody to have done otherwise. I, on the contrary, throw the onus of the argument not on presumable tendencies of nature, but on the known facts of that morning's execution, as recorded by multitudes. What else, I demand, than mere weight of metal, absolute nobility of deportment, broke the vast line of battle then arrayed against her? What else but her meek, saintly demeanor won from the enemies, that till now had believed her a witch, tears of rapturous admiration? "Ten thousand men," says M. 5 Michelet himself, "ten thousand men wept;" and of these ten thousand the majority were political enemies knitted together by cords of superstition. What else was it but her constancy, united with her angelic gentleness, that drove the frantic English soldier—who had 10 sworn to throw a fagot on her scaffold, as his tribute of abhorrence, that did so, that fulfilled his vow—suddenly to turn away a penitent for life, saying everywhere that he had seen a dove rising upon wings to heaven from the ashes where she had stood? What 15 else drove the executioner to kneel at every shrine for pardon to his share in the tragedy? And if all this were insufficient, then I cite the closing act of her life, as valid on her behalf, were all other testimonies against her. The executioner had been directed to apply his 20 torch from below. He did so. The fiery smoke rose upwards in billowing volumes. A Dominican monk was then standing almost at her side. Wrapped up in his sublime office, he saw not the danger, but still persisted in his prayers. Even then, when the last enemy was 25 racing up the fiery stairs to seize her, even at that moment did this noblest of girls think only for him, the one friend that would not forsake her, and not for herself; bidding him with her last breath to care for his own preservation, but to leave her to God. That girl, whose latest breath ascended in this sublime expression of self-oblivion, did not utter the word recant either with her lips or in her heart. No; she did not, though one should rise from the dead to swear it.

Bishop of Beauvais! thy victim died in fire upon a scaffold, — thou upon a down bed. But for the departing minutes of life, both are oftentimes alike. At the farewell crisis, when the gates of death are opening, and 10 flesh is resting from its struggles, oftentimes the tortured and torturer have the same truce from carnal torment; both sink together into sleep; together both, sometimes, kindle into dreams. When the mortal mists were gathering fast upon you two, bishop and shepherd
15 girl — when the pavilions of life were closing up their shadowy curtains about you — let us try, through the gigantic glooms, to decipher the flying features of your separate visions.

The shepherd girl that had delivered France — she,
20 from her dungeon, she, from her baiting at the stake, she, from her duel with fire, as she entered her last dream — saw Domrémy, saw the fountain of Domrémy, saw the pomp of forests in which her childhood had wandered. The Easter festival, which man had denied
25 to her languishing heart — that resurrection of spring-time, which the darkness of dungeons had intercepted from her, hungering after the glorious liberty of forests — were by God given back into her hands, as jewels that had been stolen from her by robbers. With those, perhaps (for the minutes of dreams can stretch into ages), was given back to her by God the bliss of childhood. By special privilege, for her might be created, in this farewell dream, a second childhood, innocent as the first; but not, like that, sad with the gloom of a fearful mission in the rear. The mission had now been fulfilled. 5 The storm was weathered, the skirts even of that mighty storm were drawing off. The blood that she was to reckon for had been exacted; the tears that she was to shed in secret had been paid to the last. The hatred to herself in all eyes had been faced steadily, had been 10 suffered, had been survived. And in her last fight upon the scaffold she had triumphed gloriously; victoriously she had tasted the stings of death. For all, except this comfort from her farewell dream, she had died — died, amidst the tears of ten thousand enemies — died, amidst 15 the drums and trumpets of armies — died, amidst peals redoubling upon peals, volleys upon volleys, from the saluting clarions of martyrs.

Bishop of Beauvais! because the guilt-burdened man is in dreams haunted and waylaid by the most frightful of his crimes, and because upon that fluctuating mirror — rising (like the mocking mirrors of mirage in Arabian deserts) from the fens of death — most of all are reflected the sweet countenances which the man has laid in ruins; therefore I know, bishop, that you also, enter- 25 ing your final dream, saw Domrémy. That fountain, of which the witnesses spoke so much, showed itself to your eyes in pure morning dews: but neither dews, nor the holy dawn, could cleanse away the bright spots of innocent blood upon its surface. By the fountain, bishop, you saw a woman seated, that hid her face. But as you draw near, the woman raises her wasted features. Would Domrémy know them again for the features of her child? Ah, but you know them, bishop, well! Oh, mercy! 5 what a groan was that which the servants, waiting outside the bishop's dream at his bedside, heard from his laboring heart, as at this moment he turned away from the fountain and the woman, seeking rest in the forests afar off. Yet not so to escape the woman, whom once 10 again he must behold before he dies. In the forests to which he prays for pity, will he find a respite? What a tumult, what a gathering of feet is there! In glades, where only wild deer should run, armies and nations are assembling; towering in the fluctuating crowd are phan- 15 toms that belong to departed hours. There is the great English Prince, Regent of France. There is my Lord of Winchester, the princely cardinal, that died and made no sign. There is the Bishop of Beauvais, clinging to the shelter of thickets. What building is that which 20 hands so rapid are raising? Is it a martyr's scaffold? Will they burn the child of Domrémy a second time? No: it is a tribunal that rises to the clouds; and two nations stand around it, waiting for a trial. Shall my Lord of Beauvais sit again upon the judgment-seat, and 25 again number the hours for the innocent? Ah! no: he is the prisoner at the bar. Already all is waiting: the mighty audience is gathered, the Court is hurrying to their seats, the witnesses are arrayed, the trumpets are sounding, the judge is taking his place. Oh! but this is sudden. My Lord, have you no counsel? "Counsel I have none : in heaven above, or on earth beneath, counsellor there is none now that would take a brief from me : all are silent." Is it, indeed, come to this ? Alas, the time is short, the tumult is wondrous, the crowd stretches away into infinity, but yet I will search in it for somebody to take your brief : I know of somebody that will be your counsel. Who is this that cometh from Domrémy ? Who is she in bloody coronation robes from Rheims ? Who is she that cometh with blackened flesh from walking the furnaces of Rouen ? This is she, the shepherd girl, counsellor that had none for herself, whom I choose, bishop, for yours. She it is, I engage, that shall take my lord's brief. She it is, bishop, that would plead for you : yes, bishop, SHE — when heaven and earth are silent.

THE ENGLISH MAIL-COACH.

SECTION THE FIRST.

THE GLORY OF MOTION.

SOME twenty or more years before I matriculated at Oxford, Mr. Palmer, at that time M.P. for Bath, had accomplished two things, very hard to do on our little planet the Earth, however cheap they may be held by 5 eccentric people in comets — he had invented mail-coaches, and he had married the daughter of a duke. He was, therefore, just twice as great a man as Galileo, who did certainly invent (or, which is the same thing, discover) the satellites of Jupiter, those very next 10 things extant to mail-coaches in the two capital pretensions of speed and keeping time, but, on the other hand, who did not marry the daughter of a duke.

These mail-coaches, as organized by Mr. Palmer, are entitled to a circumstantial notice from myself, having 15 had so large a share in developing the anarchies of my subsequent dreams ; an agency which they accomplished, first, through velocity, at that time unprecedented — for they first revealed the glory of motion ; secondly, through grand effects for the eye between lamp-light and the darkness upon solitary roads; thirdly, through animal beauty and power so often displayed in the class of horses selected for this mail service; fourthly, through the conscious presence of a central intellect, 5 that, in the midst of vast distances — of storms, of darkness, of danger — overruled all obstacles into one steady co-operation to a national result. For my own feeling, this post-office service spoke as by some mighty orchestra, where a thousand instruments, all disregard- 10 ing each other, and so far in danger of discord, yet all obedient as slaves to the supreme bâton of some great leader, terminate in a perfection of harmony like that of heart, brain, and lungs, in a healthy animal organization. But, finally, that particular element in this whole 15 combination which most impressed myself, and through which it is that to this hour Mr. Palmer's mail-coach system tyrannizes over my dreams by terror and terrific beauty, lay in the awful political mission which at that time it fulfilled. The mail-coach it was that distributed 20 over the face of the land, like the opening of apocalyptic vials, the heart-shaking news of Trafalgar, of Salamanca, of Vittoria, of Waterloo. These were the harvests that, in the grandeur of their reaping, redeemed the tears and blood in which they had been 25 sown. Neither was the meanest peasant so much below the grandeur and the sorrow of the times as to confound battles such as these, which were gradually moulding the destinies of Christendom, with the vulgar conflicts of ordinary warfare, so often no more than gladiatorial trials of national prowess. The victories of England in this stupendous contest rose of themselves as natural Te Deums to heaven; and it was felt by the thoughtful that such victories, at such a crisis of general prostration, were not more beneficial to ourselves than finally to France, our enemy, and to the nations of all western or central Europe, through whose pusillanimity it was that the French domination had prospered.

The modern modes of travelling cannot compare with the old mail-coach system in grandeur and power. They boast of more velocity, not, however, as a consciousness, but as a fact of our lifeless knowledge, resting upon alien evidence; as, for instance, because somebody says that we have gone fifty miles in the hour, though we are far from feeling it as a personal experience, or upon the evidence of a result, as that actually we find ourselves in York four hours after leaving London. Apart from such an assertion, or such a result, I myself am little aware of the pace. But, seated on the old mail-coach, we needed no evidence out of ourselves to indicate the velocity. On this system the word was, Non magna loquimur, as upon railways, but vivimus. Yes, "magna vivimus;" we do not make verbal ostentation of our grandeurs, we realize our grandeurs in act, and in the very experience of life. (The vital experience of the glad animal sensibilities made doubts impossible on the question of our speed; we heard our speed, we saw it, we felt it as a thrilling; and this speed was not the product of blind insensate agencies that had no sympathy to give, but was incarnated in the fiery eyeballs of the noblest among brutes, in his dilated nostril, spasmodic muscles, and thunder-beating hoofs.) The sensibility of the horse, uttering itself in the maniac light of his eye, might be the last vibration of such a movement; the glory of Salamanca might be the first. But 5 the intervening links that connected them, that spread the earthquake of battle into the eyeball of the horse, were the heart of man and its electric thrillings — kindling in the rapture of the fiery strife, and then propagating its own tumults by contagious shouts and 10 gestures to the heart of his servant the horse.

But now, on the new system of travelling, iron tubes and boilers have disconnected man's heart from the ministers of his locomotion. Nile nor Trafalgar has power to raise an extra bubble in a steam-kettle. The 15 galvanic cycle is broken up forever; man's imperial nature no longer sends itself forward through the electric sensibility of the horse; the inter-agencies are gone in the mode of communication between the horse and his master, out of which grew so many aspects of sub-20 limity under accidents of mists that hid, or sudden blazes that revealed, of mobs that agitated, or midnight solitudes that awed. Tidings, fitted to convulse all nations, must henceforwards travel by culinary process; and the trumpet that once announced from afar the 25 laurelled mail, heart-shaking when heard screaming on the wind, and proclaiming itself through the darkness to every village or solitary house on its route, has now given way forever to the pot-walloppings of the boiler.

GOING DOWN WITH VICTORY.

But the grandest chapter of our experience, within the whole mail-coach service, was on those occasions when we went down from London with the news of victory. A period of about ten years stretched from Trafalgar to Waterloo: the second and third years of which period (1806 and 1807) were comparatively sterile; but the other nine (from 1805 to 1815 inclusively) furnished a long succession of victories; the least of which, in such a contest of Titans, had an inappreciable value of position — partly for its absolute interference with the plans of our enemy, but still more from its keeping alive through central Europe the sense of a deep-seated vulnerability in France. Even to tease the coasts of our enemy, to mortify them by continual blockades, to insult them by capturing if it were but a baubling schooner under the eyes of their arrogant armies, repeated from time to time a sullen proclamation of power lodged in one quarter to which the hopes of Christendom turned in secret. How much more loudly must this proclamation have spoken in the audacity of having bearded the élite of their troops, and having beaten them in pitched battles! Five years of life it was worth paying down for the privilege of an outside place on a mail-coach, when carrying down the first tidings of any such event. And it is to be noted that, from our insular situation, and the multitude of our frigates disposable for the rapid transmission of intelligence, rarely did an unauthorized rumor steal away a prelibation from the first aroma of the regular despatches. The government news was generally the earliest news.

From eight P.M. to fifteen or twenty minutes later, imagine the mails assembled on parade in Lombard Street, where, at that time, and not in St. Martin's-le-Grand, was seated the General Post-office. In what exact strength we mustered I do not remember; but, from the length of each separate attelage, we filled the street, though a long one, and though we were drawn up in double file. On any night the spectacle was beautiful. 10 The absolute perfection of all the appointments about the carriages and the harness, their strength, their brilliant cleanliness, their beautiful simplicity — but, more than all, the royal magnificence of the horses — were what might first have fixed the attention. Every carriage, on every morning in the year, was taken down to an official inspector for examination — wheels, axles, linchpins, pole, glasses, lamps, were all critically probed and tested. Every part of every carriage had been cleaned, every horse had been groomed, with as much 20 rigor as if they belonged to a private gentleman; and that part of the spectacle offered itself always. But the night before us is a night of victory; and, behold! to the ordinary display, what a heart-shaking addition! — horses, men, carriages, all are dressed in laurels and 25 flowers, oak-leaves and ribbons. The guards, as being officially His Majesty's servants, and of the coachmen such as are within the privilege of the post-office, wear the royal liveries of course; and as it is summer (for all the land victories were naturally won in summer), they wear, on this fine evening, these liveries exposed to view, without any covering of upper coats. Such a costume, and the elaborate arrangement of the laurels in their hats, dilate their hearts, by giving to them openly a personal connection with the great news, in which already they have the general interest of patriotism. That great national sentiment surmounts and quells all sense of ordinary distinctions. Those passengers who happen to be gentlemen are now hardly to be distinguished as such except by dress ; for the usual reserve of their manner in speaking to the attendants has on this night melted away. One heart, one pride, one glory, connects every man by the transcendent bond of his national blood. The spectators, who are numerous beyond precedent, express their sympathy with these fervent feelings by continual hurrahs. Every moment are shouted aloud by the post-office servants, and summoned to draw up, the great ancestral names of cities known to history through a thousand years — Lincoln, Winchester, Portsmouth, Gloucester, Oxford, Bristol, Manchester, York, Newcastle, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Perth, Stirling, Aberdeen — expressing the grandeur of the empire by the antiquity of its towns, and the grandeur of the mail establishment by the diffusive radiation of its separate missions. Every moment you hear the thunder of lids locked down upon the mail-bags. That sound to each individual mail is the signal for drawing off, which process is the finest part of the entire spectacle. Then come the horses into play. Horses ! can these be horses that bound off with the action and gestures of leopards ?

What stir! — what sea-like ferment! — what a thundering of wheels! — what a trampling of hoofs! — what a sounding of trumpets! — what farewell cheers! — what redoubling peals of brotherly congratulation, connecting the name of the particular mail — “Liverpool forever!” 5 — with the name of the particular victory — “Badajoz forever!” or “Salamanca forever!” The half-slumbering consciousness that, all night long, and all the next day — perhaps for even a longer period — many of these mails, like fire racing along a train of gunpowder, will 10 be kindling at every instant new successions of burning joy, has an obscure effect of multiplying the victory itself, by multiplying to the imagination into infinity the stages of its progressive diffusion. A fiery arrow seems to be let loose, which from that moment is des- 15 tined to travel, without intermission, westwards for three hundred miles — northwards for six hundred; and the sympathy of our Lombard Street friends at parting is exalted a hundred-fold by a sort of visionary sympathy with the yet slumbering sympathies which in so vast a 20 succession we are going to awake.

Liberated from the embarrassments of the City, and issuing into the broad uncrowded avenues of the northern suburbs, we soon begin to enter upon our natural pace of ten miles an hour. In the broad light of the 25 summer evening, the sun, perhaps, only just at the point of setting, we are seen from every story of every house. Heads of every age crowd to the windows — young and old understand the language of our victorious symbols — and rolling volleys of sympathizing cheers run along us, behind us, and before us. The beggar, rearing himself against the wall, forgets his lameness — real or assumed — thinks not of his whining trade, but stands erect, with bold, exulting smiles, as we pass him. The 5 victory has healed him, and says, Be thou whole! Women and children, from garrets alike and cellars, through infinite London, look down or look up with loving eyes upon our gay ribbons and our martial laurels: sometimes kiss their hands; sometimes hang out, as sig-

10 nals of affection, pocket-handkerchiefs, aprons, dusters, anything that, by catching the summer breezes, will express an ærial jubilation. On the London side of Barnet, to which we draw near within a few minutes after nine, observe that private carriage which is ap-
15 proaching us. The weather being so warm, the glasses are all down; and one may read, as on the stage of a theatre, everything that goes on within. It contains three ladies — one likely to be “mamma,” and two of seventeen or eighteen, who are probably her daughters.
20 What lovely animation, what beautiful unpremeditated pantomime, explaining to us every syllable that passes in these ingenuous girls. By the sudden start and raising of the hands, on first discovering our laurelled equipage! — by the sudden movement and appeal to the 25 elder lady from both of them — and by the heightened color on their animated countenances, we can almost hear them saying, “See, see! Look at their laurels! Oh, mamma! there has been a great battle in Spain; and it has been a great victory.” In a moment we are on the point of passing them. We passengers — I on the box, and the two on the roof behind me — raised our hats to the ladies; the coachman makes his professional salute with the whip; the guard even, though punctilious on the matter of his dignity as an officer under the crown, touches his hat. The ladies move to us, in return, with a winning graciousness of gesture; all smile on each side in a way that nobody could misunderstand, and that nothing short of a grand national sympathy could so instantaneously prompt. Will these ladies say that we are nothing to them? Oh, no; they will not say that. They cannot deny — they do not deny — that for this night they are our sisters; gentle or simple, scholar or illiterate servant, for twelve hours to come, we on the outside have the honor to be their brothers. Those poor women, again, who stop to gaze upon us with delight at the entrance of Barnet, and seem, by their air of weariness, to be returning from labor — do you mean to say that they are washerwomen and charwomen? Oh, my poor friend, you are quite mistaken. I assure you they stand in a far higher rank; for this one night they feel themselves by birth-right to be daughters of England, and answer to no humbler title.

Every joy, however, even rapturous joy — such is the sad law of earth — may carry with it grief, or fear of grief, to some. Three miles beyond Barnet, we see approaching us another private carriage, nearly repeating the circumstances of the former case. Here, also, the glasses are all down — here, also, is an elderly lady seated; but the two daughters are missing; for the single young person sitting by the lady's side seems to be an attendant — so I judge from her dress, and her air of respectful reserve. The lady is in mourning, and her countenance expresses sorrow. At first she does not look up; so that I believe she is not aware of our approach, until she hears the measured beating of our horses' hoofs. Then she raises her eyes to settle them painfully on our triumphal equipage. Our decorations explain the case to her at once; but she beholds them with apparent anxiety, or even with terror. Some time before this, I, finding it difficult to hit a flying mark, when embarrassed by the coachman's person and reins intervening, had given to the guard a Courier evening paper, containing the gazette, for the next carriage that might pass.

Accordingly he tossed it in, so folded that the huge capitals, expressing some such legend as GLORIOUS VICTORY, might catch the eyes at once. To see the paper, however, at all, interpreted as it was by our ensigns of triumph, explained everything; and, if the guard were right in thinking the lady to have received it with a gesture of horror, it could not be doubtful that she had suffered some deep personal affliction in connection with this Spanish war.

Here, now, was the case of one who, having formerly suffered, might, erroneously perhaps, be distressing herself with anticipations of another similar suffering. That same night, and hardly three hours later, occurred the reverse case. A poor woman, who too probably would find herself in a day or two to have suffered the heaviest of afflictions by the battle, blindly allowed herself to express an exultation so unmeasured in the news and its details, as gave to her the appearance which amongst Celtic Highlanders is called fey. This was at some little town where we changed horses an hour or two after midnight. Some fair or wake had kept the people up out of their beds, and had occasioned a partial illumination of the stalls and booths, presenting an unusual but very impressive effect. We saw many lights moving about as we drew near; and perhaps the most striking scene on the whole route was our reception at this place. (The flashing of torches and the beautiful radiance of blue lights (technically, Bengal lights) upon the heads of our horses; the fine effect of such a showery and ghostly illumination falling upon our flowers and glittering laurels; whilst all around ourselves, that formed a centre of light, the darkness gathered on the rear and flanks in massy blackness; these optical splendors, together with the prodigious enthusiasm of the people, composed a picture at once scenical and affecting, theatrical and holy.) As we stayed for three or four minutes, I alighted; and immediately from a dismantled stall in the street, where no doubt she had been presiding through the earlier part of the night, advanced eagerly a middle-aged woman. The sight of my newspaper it was that had drawn her attention upon myself. The victory which we were carrying down to the provinces on this occasion, was the imperfect one of Talavera — imperfect for its results, such was the virtual treachery of the Spanish general, Cuesta, but not imperfect in its ever-memorable heroism. I told her the main outline of the battle. The agitation of her enthusiasm had been so conspicuous when listening, and when first applying for information, that I could not but ask her if she had not some relative in 5 the Peninsular army. Oh, yes; her only son was there. In what regiment? He was a trooper in the 23d Dragoons. My heart sank within me as she made that answer. This sublime regiment, which an Englishman should never mention without raising his hat to their

10 memory, had made the most memorable and effective charge recorded in military annals. They leaped their horses — over a trench where they could, into it, and with the result of death and mutilation, when they could not. What proportion cleared the trench is no-
15 where stated. Those who did, closed up and went down upon the enemy with such divinity of fervor (I use the word divinity by design: the inspiration of God must have prompted this movement to those whom even then He was calling to His presence), that two results
20 followed. As regarded the enemy, this 23d Dragoons, not, I believe, originally three hundred and fifty strong, paralyzed a French column six thousand strong, then ascended the hill, and fixed the gaze of the whole French army. As regarded themselves, the 23d were supposed 25 at first to have been barely not annihilated; but eventually, I believe, about one in four survived. And this, then, was the regiment — a regiment already for some hours glorified and hallowed to the ear of all London, as lying stretched, by a large majority, upon one bloody aceldama — in which the young trooper served whose mother was now talking in a spirit of such joyous enthusiasm. Did I tell her the truth? Had I the heart to break up her dreams? No. To-morrow, said I to myself—to-morrow, or the next day, will publish the worst. For one night more, wherefore should she not sleep in peace? After to-morrow, the chances are too many that peace will forsake her pillow. This brief respite, then, let her owe to my gift and my forbearance. But if I told her not of the bloody price that had been paid, not, therefore, was I silent on the contributions 10 from her son's regiment to that day's service and glory. I showed her not the funeral banners under which the noble regiment was sleeping. I lifted not the overshadowing laurels from the bloody trench in which horse and rider lay mangled together. But I told her 15 how these dear children of England, officers and privates, had leaped their horses over all obstacles as gayly as hunters to the morning's chase. I told her how they rode their horses into the mists of death (saying to myself, but not saying to her), and laid down their 20 young lives for thee, O mother England! as willingly—poured out their noble blood as cheerfully—as ever, after a long day's sport, when infants, they had rested their wearied heads upon their mother's knees, or had sunk to sleep in her arms. (Strange it is, yet true, that 25 she seemed to have no fears for her son's safety, even after this knowledge that the 23d Dragoons had been memorably engaged; but so much was she enraptured by the knowledge that his regiment, and therefore that he, had rendered conspicuous service in the dreadful conflict—a service which had actually made them, within the last twelve hours, the foremost topic of conversation in London—so absolutely was fear swallowed up in joy—that, in the mere simplicity of her fervent nature, the poor woman threw her arms round my neck, as she thought of her son, and gave to me the kiss which secretly was meant for him.)

SECTION THE SECOND.

THE VISION OF SUDDEN DEATH.

THE incident, so memorable in itself by its features of horror, and so scenical by its grouping for the eye, which furnished the text for this reverie upon Sudden Death, occurred to myself in the dead of night, as a solitary spectator, when seated on the box of the Manchester and Glasgow mail in the second or third summer after Waterloo. I find it necessary to relate the circumstances, because they are such as could not have occurred unless under a singular combination of accidents. In those days the oblique and lateral communications with 10 many rural post-offices were so arranged, either through necessity, or through defect of system, as to make it requisite for the main north-western mail (i.e., the down mail), on reaching Manchester, to halt for a number of hours; how many, I do not remember—six or seven, I 15 think; but the result was, that, in the ordinary course, the mail recommenced its journey northwards about midnight. Wearied with the long detention at a gloomy hotel, I walked out about eleven o'clock at night for the sake of fresh air; meaning to fall in with the mail, and 20 resume my seat at the post-office. The night, however, being yet dark, as the moon had scarcely risen, and the streets being at that hour empty, so as to offer no opportunities for asking the road, I lost my way; and did not reach the post-office until it was considerably past midnight; but, to my great relief (as it was important for me to be in Westmoreland by the morning), I saw in the huge saucer eyes of the mail, blazing through the gloom, an evidence that my chance was not yet lost. Past the time it was; but, by some rare accident, the mail was not even yet ready to start. I ascended to my seat on the box, where my cloak was still lying as it had lain at the Bridgewater Arms. (I had left it there in imitation of a nautical discoverer, who leaves a bit of bunting on the shore of his discovery, by way of warning off the ground the whole human race, and notifying to the Christian and the heathen worlds, with his best compliments, that he has hoisted his pocket handkerchief once and forever upon that virgin soil; thenceforward claiming the jus dominii to the top of the atmosphere above it; and also the right of driving shafts to the centre of the earth below it; so that all people found after this warning, either aloft in upper chambers of the atmosphere, or groping in subterraneous shafts, or squatting audaciously on the surface of the soil, will be treated as trespassers — kicked, that is to say, or decapitated, as circumstances may suggest, by their very faithful servant, the owner of the said pocket handkerchief.) In the present case, it is probable that my cloak might not have been respected, and the jus gentium might have been cruelly violated in my person — for, in the dark, people commit deeds of darkness, gas being a great ally of morality. But it so happened that, on this night, there was no other outside passenger; and thus the crime, which else was but too probable, missed fire for want of a criminal.

Having mounted the box, I took a small quantity of 5 laudanum, having already travelled two hundred and fifty miles—viz., from a point seventy miles beyond London. In the taking of laudanum there was nothing extraordinary. But by accident it drew upon me the special attention of my assessor on the box, the coachman. 10
And in that also there was nothing extraordinary. But by accident, and with great delight, it drew my own attention to the fact that this coachman was a monster in point of bulk, and that he had but one eye. In fact, he had been foretold by Virgil as — 15

“Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens cui lumen ademptum.”

He answered to the conditions in every one of the items:—(1) a monster he was; (2) dreadful; (3) shapeless; (4) huge; (5) who had lost an eye. But why should that delight me? Had he been one of the Calendars in the “Arabian Nights,” and had paid down his eye as the 20 price of his criminal curiosity, what right had I to exult in his misfortune? I did not exult; I delighted in no man’s punishment, though it were even merited. But these personal distinctions (Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5) identified 25 in an instant an old friend of mine, whom I had known in the south for some years as the most masterly of mail-coachmen. He was the man in all Europe that could (if any could) have driven six-in-hand full gallop over Al

Sirat — that dreadful bridge of Mahomet, with no side battlements, and of extra room not enough for a razor's edge — leading right across the bottomless gulf. Under this eminent man, whom in Greek I cognominated
5 Cyclops diphrelates (Cyclops the charioteer), I, and others known to me, studied the diphrelatic art. Excuse, reader, a word too elegant to be pedantic. As a pupil, though I paid extra fees, it is to be lamented that I did not stand high in his esteem. It showed his dogged honesty (though,
10 observe, not his discernment), that he could not see my merits. Let us excuse his absurdity in this particular, by remembering his want of an eye. Doubtless that made him blind to my merits. In the art of conversation, however, he admitted that I had the whip-hand of him.
15 On this present occasion, great joy was at our meeting. But what was Cyclops doing here? Had the medical men recommended northern air, or how? I collected, from such explanations as he volunteered, that he had an interest at stake in some suit-at-law now pending at 20 Lancaster; so that probably he had got himself transferred to this station, for the purpose of connecting with his professional pursuits an instant readiness for the calls of his law-suit.

Meantime, what are we stopping for? Surely we have 25 now waited long enough. Oh, this procrastinating mail, and this procrastinating post-office! Can't they take a lesson upon that subject from me? Some people have called me procrastinating. Yet you are witness, reader, that I was here kept waiting for the post-office. Will the post-office lay its hand on its heart, in its moments of sobriety, and assert that ever it waited for me? What are they about? The guard tells me that there is a large extra accumulation of foreign mails this night, owing to irregularities caused by war, by wind, by weather, in the packet service, which as yet does not 5 benefit at all by steam. For an extra hour, it seems, the post-office has been engaged in threshing out the pure wheaten correspondence of Glasgow, and winnowing it from the chaff of all baser intermediate towns. But at last all is finished. Sound your horn, guard. Man- 10 chester, good-by; we've lost an hour by your criminal conduct at the post-office: which, however, though I do not mean to part with a serviceable ground of complaint, and one which really is such for the horses, to me secretly is an advantage, since it compels us to look sharply 15 for this lost hour amongst the next eight or nine, and to recover it, if we can, at the rate of one mile extra per hour. Off we are at last, and at eleven miles an hour; and for the moment I detect no changes in the energy or in the skill of Cyclops. 20

From Manchester to Kendal, which virtually (though not in law) is the capital of Westmoreland, there were at this time seven stages of eleven miles each. The first five of these, counting from Manchester, terminate in Lancaster, which is therefore fifty-five miles north of 25 Manchester, and the same distance exactly from Liverpool. The first three stages terminate in Preston (called, by way of distinction from other towns of that name, proud Preston), at which place it is that the separate roads from Liverpool and from Manchester to the north become confluent. Within these first three stages lay the foundation, the progress, and termination of our night's adventure. During the first stage, I found out that Cyclops was mortal: he was liable to the shocking

5 affection of sleep—a thing which previously I had never suspected. If a man indulges in the vicious habit of sleeping, all the skill in aurigation of Apollo himself, with the horses of Aurora to execute his notions, avail him nothing. “Oh, Cyclops!” I exclaimed, “thou art
10 mortal. My friend, thou snoorest.” Through the first eleven miles, however, this infirmity—which I grieve to say that he shared with the whole Pagan Pantheon—betrayed itself only by brief snatches. On waking up, he made an apology for himself, which, instead of mend-
15 ing matters, laid open a gloomy vista of coming disasters. The summer assizes, he reminded me, were now going on at Lancaster, in consequence of which, for three nights and three days, he had not lain down in a bed. During the day, he was waiting for his own summons as 20 a witness on the trial in which he was interested; or else, lest he should be missing at the critical moment, was drinking with the other witnesses, under the pastoral surveillance of the attorneys. During the night, or that part of it which at sea would form the middle 25 watch, he was driving. This explanation certainly accounted for his drowsiness, but in a way which made it much more alarming; since now, after several days' resistance to this infirmity, at length he was steadily giving way. Throughout the second stage he grew more and more drowsy. In the second mile of the third stage, he surrendered himself finally and without a struggle to his perilous temptation. All his past resistance had but deepened the weight of this final oppression. Seven atmospheres of sleep rested upon him; and to consummate the case, our worthy guard, after singing "Love amongst the roses" for perhaps thirty times, without invitation, and without applause, had in revenge moodily resigned himself to slumber—not so deep, doubtless, as the coachman's, but deep enough for mischief. And thus at last, about ten miles from Preston, it came about that I found myself left in charge of His Majesty's London and Glasgow mail, then running at the least twelve miles an hour. 5 10

On this occasion the usual silence and solitude prevailed along the road. Not a hoof nor a wheel was to be heard. And to strengthen this false luxurious confidence in the noiseless roads, it happened also that the night was one of peculiar solemnity and peace. For my own part, though slightly alive to the possibilities of peril, I had so far yielded to the influence of the mighty calm as to sink into a profound revery. The month was August, in the middle of which lay my own birthday—a festival to every thoughtful man suggesting solemn and often sigh-born thoughts. The county was my own native county, upon which, in its southern section, more than upon any equal area known to man past or present, had descended the original curse of labor in its heaviest form, not mastering the bodies only of men as of slaves, or criminals in mines, but working through the fiery will. Upon no equal space of earth was, or 15 20 25 ever had been, the same energy of human power put forth daily. At this particular season also of the assizes, that dreadful hurricane of flight and pursuit, as it might have seemed to a stranger, which swept to and from 5 Lancaster all day long, hunting the county up and down, and regularly subsiding back into silence about sunset, could not fail (when united with this permanent distinction of Lancashire as the very metropolis and citadel of labor) to point the thoughts pathetically upon that 10 counter vision of rest, of saintly repose from strife and sorrow, towards which, as to their secret haven, the profounder aspirations of men's hearts are in solitude continually travelling. Obliquely upon our left we were nearing the sea, which also must, under the present cir-

15 cumstances, be repeating the general state of halcyon repose. The sea, the atmosphere, the light, bore each an orchestral part in this universal lull. (Moonlight, and the first timid tremblings of the dawn, were by this time blending; and the blendings were brought into a 20 still more exquisite state of unity by a slight silvery mist, motionless and dreamy, that covered the woods and fields, but with a veil of equable transparency.) Except the feet of our own horses, which, running on a sandy margin of the road, made but little disturbance, 25 there was no sound abroad. In the clouds, and on the earth, prevailed the same majestic peace; and in spite of all that the villain of a schoolmaster has done for the ruin of our sublimer thoughts, which are the thoughts of our infancy, we still believe in no such nonsense as a limited atmosphere. Whatever we may swear with our false feigning lips, in our faithful hearts we still believe, and must forever believe, in fields of air traversing the total gulf between earth and the central heavens. Still, in the confidence of children that tread without fear every chamber in their father's house, and to whom no 5 door is closed, we, in that Sabbatic vision which sometimes is revealed for an hour upon nights like this, ascend with easy steps from the sorrow-stricken fields of earth, upwards to the sandals of God.

Suddenly, from thoughts like these, I was awakened 10 to a sullen sound, as of some motion on the distant road. It stole upon the air for a moment; I listened in awe; but then it died away. Once roused, however, I could not but observe with alarm the quickened motion of our horses. Ten years' experience had made my eye 15 learned in the valuing of motion; and I saw that we were now running thirteen miles an hour. I pretend to no presence of mind. On the contrary, my fear is, that I am miserably and shamefully deficient in that quality as regards action. The palsy of doubt and distraction 20 hangs like some guilty weight of dark unfathomed remembrances upon my energies, when the signal is flying for action. But, on the other hand, this accursed gift I have, as regards thought, that in the first step towards the possibility of a misfortune, I see its total 25 evolution; in the radix of the series I see too certainly and too instantly its entire expansion; in the first syllable of the dreadful sentence, I read already the last. It was not that I feared for ourselves. Us, our bulk and impetus charmed against peril in any collision. And I had ridden through too many hundreds of perils that were frightful to approach, that were matter of laughter to look back upon, the first face of which was horror — the parting face a jest, for any anxiety to rest upon our 5 interests. The mail was not built, I felt assured, nor bespoke, that could betray me who trusted to its protection. But any carriage that we could meet would be frail and light in comparison of ourselves. And I remarked this ominous accident of our situation. We 10 were on the wrong side of the road. But then, it may be said, the other party, if other there was, might also be on the wrong side; and two wrongs might make a right. That was not likely. The same motive which had drawn us to the right-hand side of the road — 15 viz., the luxury of the soft beaten sand, as contrasted with the paved centre — would prove attractive to others. The two adverse carriages would therefore, to a certainty, be travelling on the same side; and from this side, as not being ours in law, the crossing over to 20 the other would, of course, be looked for from us. Our lamps, still lighted, would give the impression of vigilance on our part. And every creature that met us, would rely upon us for quartering. All this, and if the separate links of the anticipation had been a thousand 25 times more, I saw, not discursively, or by effort, or by succession, but by one flash of horrid simultaneous intuition.

Under this steady though rapid anticipation of the evil which might be gathering ahead, ah! what a sullen mystery of fear, what a sigh of woe, was that which stole upon the air, as again, the far-off sound of a wheel was heard! A whisper it was — a whisper from, perhaps, four miles off — secretly announcing a ruin that, being foreseen, was not the less inevitable; that, being known, was not, therefore, healed. What could be done 5 — who was it that could do it — to check the storm-flight of these maniacal horses? Could I not seize the reins from the grasp of the slumbering coachman? You, reader, think that it would have been in your power to do so. And I quarrel not with your estimate of your- 10 self. But, from the way in which the coachman's hand was viced between his upper and lower thigh, this was impossible. Easy, was it? See, then, that bronze equestrian statue. The cruel rider has kept the bit in his horse's mouth for two centuries. Unbridle him, for a 15 minute, if you please, and wash his mouth with water. Easy, was it? Unhorse me, then, that imperial rider; knock me those marble feet from those marble stirrups of Charlemagne.

The sounds ahead strengthened, and were now too 20 clearly the sounds of wheels. Who and what could it be? Was it industry in a taxed cart? Was it youthful gayety in a gig? Was it sorrow that loitered, or joy that raced? For as yet the snatches of sound were too intermitting, from distance, to decipher the character of 25 the motion. Whoever were the travellers, something must be done to warn them. Upon the other party rests the active responsibility, but upon us — and, woe is me; that us was reduced to my frail opium-shattered self — rests the responsibility of warning. Yet, how should this be accomplished? Might I not sound the guard's horn? Already, on the first thought, I was making my way over the roof to the guard's seat. But this, from the accident which I have mentioned, of the foreign 5 mails being piled upon the roof, was a difficult and even dangerous attempt to one cramped by nearly three hundred miles of outside travelling. And, fortunately, before I had lost much time in the attempt, our frantic horses swept round an angle of the road, which opened

10 upon us that final stage where the collision must be accomplished, and the catastrophe sealed. All was apparently finished. The court was sitting; the case was heard; the judge had finished; and only the verdict was yet in arrears.

15 Before us lay an avenue, straight as an arrow, six hundred yards, perhaps, in length; and the umbrageous trees, which rose in a regular line from either side, meeting high overhead, gave to it the character of a cathedral aisle. These trees lent a deeper solemnity to the 20 early light; but there was still light enough to perceive, at the further end of this Gothic aisle, a frail reedy gig, in which were seated a young man, and by his side a young lady. Ah, young sir! what are you about? If it is requisite that you should whisper your communications to this young lady — though really I see nobody, at 25 an hour and on a road so solitary, likely to overhear you — is it therefore requisite that you should carry your lips forward to hers? The little carriage is creeping on at one mile an hour; and the parties within it being thus tenderly engaged, are naturally bending down their heads. Between them and eternity, to all human calculations, there is but a minute and a half. Oh heavens! what is it that I shall do? Speaking or acting, what help can I offer? Strange it is, and to a mere auditor of the tale might seem laughable, that I should need a suggestion from the "Iliad" to prompt the sole resource that remained. Yet so it was. Suddenly I remembered the shout of Achilles and its effect. But could I pretend to shout like the son of Peleus, aided by Pallas? No: but then I needed not the shout that should alarm 10 all Asia militant; such a shout would suffice as might carry terror into the hearts of two thoughtless young people, and one gig-horse. I shouted—and the young man heard me not. A second time I shouted—and now he heard me, for now he raised his head. 15

Here, then, all had been done that, by me, could be done: more on my part was not possible. Mine had been the first step; the second was for the young man; the third was for God. If, said I, this stranger is a brave man, and if, indeed, he loves the young girl at his 20 side—or, loving her not, if he feels the obligation, pressing upon every man worthy to be called a man, of doing his utmost for a woman confided to his protection—he will, at least, make some effort to save her. If that fails, he will not perish the more, or by a death more cruel, 25 for having made it; and he will die as a brave man should, with his face to the danger, and with his arm about the woman that he sought in vain to save. But, if he makes no effort, shrinking, without a struggle, from his duty, he himself will not the less certainly perish for this baseness of poltroonery. He will die no less : and why not ? Wherefore should we grieve that there is one craven less in the world ? No ; let him perish, without a pitying thought of ours wasted upon him ;

5 and, in that case, all our grief will be reserved for the fate of the helpless girl who now, upon the least shadow of failure in him, must, by the fiercest of translations — must, without time for a prayer — must, within seventy seconds, stand before the judgment-seat of God.

10 But craven he was not : sudden had been the call upon him, and sudden was his answer to the call. He saw, he heard, he comprehended, the ruin that was coming down : already its gloomy shadow darkened above him ; and already he was measuring his strength to deal with it.
15 Ah ! what a vulgar thing does courage seem, when we see nations buying it and selling it for a shilling a day : ah ! what a sublime thing does courage seem, when some fearful summons on the great deeps of life carries a man, as if running before a hurricane, up to the giddy crest
20 of some tumultuous crisis, from which lie two courses, and a voice says to him audibly, “ One way lies hope ; take the other, and mourn forever ! ” How grand a triumph, if, even then, amidst the raving of all around him, and the frenzy of the danger, the man is able to confront
25 his situation — is able to retire for a moment into solitude with God, and to seek his counsel from Him !

For seven seconds, it might be, of his seventy, the stranger settled his countenance steadfastly upon us, as if to search and value every element in the conflict before him. For five seconds more of his seventy he sat immovably, like one that mused on some great purpose. For five more, perhaps, he sat with eyes upraised, like one that prayed in sorrow, under some extremity of doubt, for light that should guide him to the better choice. Then suddenly he rose; stood upright; and by a powerful 5 strain upon the reins, raising his horse's fore-feet from the ground, he slewed him round on the pivot of his hind-legs, so as to plant the little equipage in a position nearly at right angles to ours. Thus far his condition was not improved; except as a first step had been taken 10 towards the possibility of the second. If no more were done, nothing was done; for the little carriage still occupied the very centre of our path, though in an altered direction. Yet even now it may not be too late: fifteen of the seventy seconds may still be unexhausted; and 15 one almighty bound may avail to clear the ground. Hurry, then, hurry! for the flying moments—they hurry. Oh, hurry, hurry, my brave young man! for the cruel hoofs of our horses—they also hurry! Fast are the flying moments, faster are the hoofs of our 20 horses. But fear not for him, if human energy can suffice; faithful was he that drove to his terrific duty; faithful was the horse to his command. One blow, one impulse given with voice and hand, by the stranger, one rush from the horse, one bound as if in the act of rising 25 to a fence, landed the docile creature's fore-feet upon the crown or arching centre of the road. The larger half of the little equipage had then cleared our overtowering shadow: that was evident even to my own agitated sight. But it mattered little that one wreck should float off in safety, if upon the wreck that perished were embarked the human freightage. The rear part of the carriage — was that certainly beyond the line of absolute ruin? What power could answer the question? Glance of 5 eye, thought of man, wing of angel, which of these had speed enough to sweep between the question and the answer, and divide the one from the other? Light does not tread upon the steps of light more indivisibly, than did our all-conquering arrival upon the escaping efforts

10 of the gig. That must the young man have felt too plainly. His back was now turned to us; not by sight could he any longer communicate with the peril; but by the dreadful rattle of our harness, too truly had his ear been instructed — that all was finished as regarded any
15 further effort of his. Already in resignation he had rested from his struggle; and perhaps in his heart he was whispering, “Father, which art in heaven, do Thou finish above what I on earth have attempted.” Faster than ever mill-race we ran past them in our inexorable
20 flight. Oh, raving of hurricanes that must have sounded in their young ears at the moment of our transit! Even in that moment the thunder of collision spoke aloud. Either with the swingle-bar, or with the haunch of our near leader, we had struck the off-wheel of the little gig, 25 which stood rather obliquely, and not quite so far advanced, as to be accurately parallel with the near-wheel. The blow, from the fury of our passage, resounded terrifically. I rose in horror, to gaze upon the ruins we might have caused. From my elevated station I looked down, and looked back upon the scene, which in a moment told its own tale, and wrote all its records on my heart forever.

Here was the map of the passion that now had finished. The horse was planted immovably, with his forefeet upon the paved crest of the central road. He of the whole party might be supposed untouched by the passion of death. The little cany carriage — partly, perhaps, from the violent torsion of the wheels in its recent movement, partly from the thundering blow we had given to it — as if it sympathized with human horror, was all alive with tremblings and shiverings. The young man trembled not, nor shivered. He sat like a rock. But his was the steadiness of agitation frozen into rest by horror. As yet he dared not to look round; for he knew that, if anything remained to do, by him it could no longer be done. And as yet he knew not for certain if their safety were accomplished. But the lady —

But the lady — ! Oh, heavens ! will that spectacle ever depart from my dreams, as she rose and sank upon her seat, sank and rose, threw up her arms wildly to heaven, clutched at some visionary object in the air, fainting, praying, raving, despairing ? Figure to yourself, reader, the elements of the case ; suffer me to recall before your mind the circumstances of that unparalleled situation. From the silence and deep peace of this saintly summer night — from the pathetic blending of this sweet moonlight, dawnlight, dreamlight — from the manly tenderness of this flattering, whispering, murmuring love — suddenly as from the woods and fields

— suddenly as from the chambers of the air opening in revelation — suddenly as from the ground yawning at her feet, leaped upon her, with the flashing of cataracts, Death the crowned phantom, with all the equipage of his 8 terrors, and the tiger roar of his voice.

The moments were numbered ; the strife was finished ; the vision was closed. In the twinkling of an eye, our flying horses had carried us to the termination of the umbrageous aisle ; at right angles we wheeled into our 10 former direction ; the turn of the road carried the scene out of my eyes in an instant, and swept it into my dreams forever.

SECTION THE THIRD.

DREAM-FUGUE.

FOUNDED ON THE PRECEDING THEME OF SUDDEN DEATH.

" Whence the sound

Of instruments, that made melodious chime,
 Was heard, of harp and organ; and who moved
 Their stops and chords, was seen; his volant touch
 Instinct through all proportions, low and high,
 Flew and pursued transverse the resonant fugue."

Par. Lost, B. XI.Tumultuosissimamente.

PASSION of sudden death! that once in youth I read and interpreted by the shadows of thy averted signs — rapture of panic taking the shape (which amongst tombs in churches I have seen) of woman bursting her sepulchral bonds — of woman's Ionic form bending forward 5 from the ruins of her grave with arching foot, with eyes upraised, with clasped adoring hands — waiting, watching, trembling, praying for the trumpet's call to rise from dust forever! Ah, vision too fearful of shudder-ing humanity on the brink of almighty abysses! — vis- 10 ion that didst start back, that didst reel away, like a shrivelling scroll from before the wrath of fire racing on the wings of the wind! Epilepsy so brief of horror, wherefore is it that thou canst not die? Passing so suddenly into darkness, wherefore is it that still thou 15
 sheddest thy sad funeral blights upon the gorgeous mosaics of dreams ? Fragment of music too passionate, heard once, and heard no more, what aileth thee, that thy deep rolling chords come up at intervals through all the worlds of sleep, and after forty years have lost no element of horror ?

I.

Lo, it is summer — almighty summer ! The everlasting gates of life and summer are thrown open wide ; and on the ocean, tranquil and verdant as a savannah, the unknown lady from the dreadful vision and I myself are 10 floating — she upon a fairy pinnacle, and I upon an English three-decker. Both of us are wooing gales of festal happiness within the domain of our common country, within that ancient watery park, within that pathless chase of ocean, where England takes her pleasure
15 as a huntress through winter and summer, from the rising to the setting sun. Ah, what a wilderness of floral beauty was hidden, or was suddenly revealed, upon the tropic islands through which the pinnacle moved ! And upon her deck what a bevy of human flowers —
20 young women how lovely, young men how noble, that were dancing together, and slowly drifting towards us amidst music and incense, amidst blossoms from forest and gorgeous corymbi from vintages, amidst natural carolling, and the echoes of sweet girlish laughter.
25 Slowly the pinnacle nears us, gayly she hails us, and silently she disappears beneath the shadow of our mighty bows. But then, as at some signal from heaven, the music, and the carols, and the sweet echoing of girlish laughter — all are hushed. What evil has smitten the pinnacle, meeting or overtaking her? Did ruin to our friends couch within our own dreadful shadow? Was our shadow the shadow of death? I looked over the bow for an answer, and, behold! the pinnacle was dismantled; the revel and the revellers were found no more; the glory of the vintage was dust; and the forests with their beauty were left without a witness upon the seas. “But where,” and I turned to our crew — “where are the lovely women that danced beneath the awning of flowers and clustering corymbi? Whither have fled the noble young men that danced with them? Answer there was none. But suddenly the man at the mast-head, whose countenance darkened with alarm, cried out, “Sail on the weather beam! Down she comes upon us; in seventy seconds she also will founder.”

II.

I looked to the weather side, and the summer had departed. The sea was rocking, and shaken with gathering wrath. Upon its surface sat mighty mists, which grouped themselves into arches and long cathedral aisles. Down one of these, with the fiery pace of a quarrel from a cross-bow, ran a frigate right athwart our course. “Are they mad?” some voice exclaimed from our deck. “Do they woo their ruin?” But in a moment, as she was close upon us, some impulse of a heady current or local vortex gave a wheeling bias to her course, and off she forged without a shock. As she ran past us, high aloft amongst the shrouds stood the lady of the pinnacle.

The deeps opened ahead in malice to receive her, towering surge of foam ran after her, the billows were fierce to catch her. But far away she was borne into desert spaces of the sea; whilst still by sight I followed her, 5 as she ran before the howling gale, chased by angry sea-birds and by maddening billows; still I saw her, as at the moment when she ran past us, standing amongst the shrouds, with her white draperies streaming before the wind. There she stood, with hair dishevelled, one 10 hand clutched amongst the tackling — rising, sinking, fluttering, trembling, praying — there for leagues I saw her as she stood, raising at intervāls one hand to heaven, amidst the fiery crests of the pursuing waves and the raving of the storm; until at last, upon a sound from 15 afar of malicious laughter and mockery, all was hidden forever in driving showers; and afterwards, but when I know not, nor how.

III.

Sweet funeral bells from some incalculable distance, wailing over the dead that die before the dawn, awakened 20 me as I slept in a boat moored to some familiar shore. The morning twilight even then was breaking; and, by the dusky revelations which it spread, I saw a girl, adorned with a garland of white roses about her head for some great festival, running along the solitary strand in 25 extremity of haste. Her running was the running of panic; and often she looked back as to some dreadful enemy in the rear. But when I leaped ashore, and followed on her steps to warn her of a peril in front, alas!

from me she fled as from another peril, and vainly I shouted to her of quicksands that lay ahead. Faster and faster she ran; round a promontory of rocks she wheeled out of sight; in an instant I also wheeled round it, but only to see the treacherous sands gathering above her head. Already her person was buried; only the fair young head and the diadem of white roses around it were still visible to the pitying heavens; and, last of all, was visible one white marble arm. I saw by the early twilight this fair young head, as it was sinking down to darkness — saw this marble arm, as it rose above her head and her treacherous grave, tossing, faltering, rising, clutching, at some false, deceiving hand stretched out from the clouds — saw this marble arm uttering her dying hope, and then uttering her dying despair. The head, the diadem, the arm — these all had sunk; at last over these also the cruel quicksand had closed; and no memorial of the fair young girl remained on earth, except my own solitary tears, and the funeral bells from the desert seas, that, rising again more softly, sang a requiem over the grave of the buried child, and over her blighted dawn.

I sat, and wept in secret the tears that men have ever given to the memory of those that died before the dawn, and by the treachery of earth, our mother. (But suddenly the tears and funeral bells were hushed by a shout as of many nations, and by a roar as from some great king's artillery, advancing rapidly along the valleys, and heard afar by echoes from the mountains.) "Hush!" I said, as I bent my ear earthwards to listen — "hush! —

this either is the very anarchy of strife, or else " — and then I listened more profoundly, and whispered as I raised my head — "or else, oh, heavens! it is victory that is final, victory that swallows up all strife."

IV.

5 Immediately, in trance, I was carried over land and sea to some distant kingdom, and placed upon a triumphal car, amongst companions crowned with laurel. The darkness of gathering midnight brooding over all the land, hid from us the mighty crowds that were weav-
10 ing restlessly about ourselves as a centre: we heard them, but saw them not. Tidings had arrived within an hour, of a grandeur that measured itself against centuries; too full of pathos they were, too full of joy, to utter themselves by other language than by tears, by 15 restless anthems, and Te Deums reverberated from the choirs and orchestras of earth. These tidings we that sat upon the laurelled car had it for our privilege to publish amongst all nations. And already, by signs audible through the darkness, by snortings and tramlings, our 20 angry horses, that knew no fear of fleshly weariness, upbraided us with delay. Wherefore was it that we delayed? We waited for a secret word, that should bear witness to the hope of nations, as now accomplished forever. At midnight the secret word arrived; which 25 word was — Waterloo and recovered Christendom! The dreadful word shone by its own light; before us it went; high above our leaders' heads it rode, and spread a golden light over the paths which we traversed. Every city at the presence of the secret word threw open its gates. The rivers were conscious as we crossed. All the forests, as we ran along their margins, shivered in homage to the secret word. And the darkness comprehended it.

Two hours after midnight we approached a mighty Minster. Its gates, which rose to the clouds, were closed. But when the dreadful word, that rode before us, reached them with its golden light, silently they moved back upon their hinges; and at a flying gallop our equipage 10 entered the grand aisle of the cathedral. Headlong was our pace; and at every altar, in the little chapels and oratories to the right hand and left of our course, the lamps, dying or sickening, kindled anew in sympathy with the secret word that was flying past. Forty 15 leagues we might have run in the cathedral, and as yet no strength of morning light had reached us, when before us we saw the ærial galleries of organ and choir. Every pinnacle of the fretwork, every station of advantage amongst the traceries, was crested by white-robed 20 choristers, that sang deliverance: that wept no more tears, as once their fathers had wept; but at intervals that sang together to the generations, saying, —

“Chant the deliverer’s praise in every tongue,”

and receiving answers from afar, —

“Such as once in heaven and earth were sung.”

And of their chanting was no end; of our headlong pace 25 was neither pause nor slackening.

Thus, as we ran like torrents — thus, as we swept with bridal rapture over the Campo Santo of the cathedral graves — suddenly we became aware of a vast necropolis rising upon the far-off horizon — a city of sepulchres, 5 built within the saintly cathedral for the warrior dead that rested from their feuds on earth. Of purple granite was the necropolis; yet, in the first minute, it lay like a purple stain upon the horizon, so mighty was the distance. In the second minute it trembled through many 10 changes, growing into terraces and towers of wondrous altitude, so mighty was the space. In the third minute already, with our dreadful gallop, we were entering its suburbs. (Vast sarcophagi rose on every side, having towers and turrets that, upon the limits of the central 15 aisle, strode forward with haughty intrusion, that ran back with mighty shadows into answering recesses.) Every sarcophagus showed many bas-reliefs — bas-reliefs of battles and of battle-fields; battles from forgotten ages — battles from yesterday — battle-fields that, long since, nature 20 had healed and reconciled to herself with the sweet oblivion of flowers — battle-fields that were yet angry and crimson with carnage. Where the terraces ran, there did we run; where the towers curved, there did we curve. With the flight of swallows our horses swept round every 25 angle. Like rivers in flood, wheeling round headlands — like hurricanes that ride into the secrets of forests — faster than ever light unwove the mazes of darkness, our flying equipage carried earthly passions, kindled warrior instincts, amongst the dust that lay around us — dust oftentimes of our noble fathers that had slept in God from

Crécy to Trafalgar. And now had we reached the last sarcophagus, now were we abreast of the last bas-relief, already had we recovered the arrow-like flight of the illimitable central aisle, when coming up this aisle to meet us we beheld afar off a female child, that rode in a carriage as frail as flowers. The mists, that went before her, hid the fawns that drew her, but could not hide the shells and tropic flowers with which she played — but could not hide the lovely smiles by which she uttered her trust in the mighty cathedral, and in the cherubim 10 that looked down upon her from the mighty shafts of its pillars. Face to face she was meeting us; face to face she rode, as if danger there were none. “Oh, baby!” I exclaimed, “shalt thou be the ransom for Waterloo? Must we, that carry tidings of great joy to every people, 15 be messengers of ruin to thee!” In horror I rose at the thought; but then also, in horror at the thought, rose one that was sculptured on a bas-relief — a dying trumpeter. Solemnly from the field of battle he rose to his feet; and, unslinging his stony trumpet, carried it, in his 20 dying anguish, to his stony lips — sounding once, and yet once again, proclamation that, in thy ears, O baby! spoke from the battlements of death. Immediately deep shadows fell between us and aboriginal silence. The choir had ceased to sing. The hoofs of our horses, the 25 dreadful rattle of our harness, the groaning of our wheels, alarmed the graves no more. By horror the bas-relief had been unlocked into life. By horror we, that were so full of life, we men and our horses, with their fiery fore-legs rising in mid-air to their everlasting gallop, were frozen to a bas-relief. Then a third time the trumpet sounded; the seals were taken off all pulses; life, and the frenzy of life, tore into their channels again; again the choir burst forth in sunny grandeur, as from 5 the muffling of storms and darkness; again the thunderings of our horses carried temptation into the graves. One cry burst from our lips, as the clouds, drawing off from the aisle, showed it empty before us — “Whither has the infant fled? — is the young child caught up to 10 God?” Lo! afar off, in a vast recess, rose three mighty windows to the clouds; and, on a level with their summits, at height insuperable to man, rose an altar of purest alabaster. On its eastern face was trembling a crimson glory. A glory was it from the reddening dawn

15 that now streamed through the windows? Was it from the crimson robes of the martyrs painted on the windows? Was it from the bloody bas-reliefs of earth? There, suddenly, within that crimson radiance, rose the apparition of a woman’s head, and then of a woman’s 20 figure. The child it was — grown up to woman’s height. Clinging to the horns of the altar, voiceless she stood — sinking, rising, raving, despairing; and behind the volume of incense, that, night and day, streamed upwards from the altar, dimly was seen the fiery font, and the 25 shadow of that dreadful being who should have baptized her with the baptism of death. But by her side was kneeling her better angel, that hid his face with wings; that wept and pleaded for her; that prayed when she could not; that fought with Heaven by tears for her deliverance; which also, as he raised his immortal countenance from his wings, I saw, by the glory in his eye, that from Heaven he had won at last.

Then was completed the passion of the mighty fugue. (The golden tubes of the organ, which as yet had but muttered at intervals — gleaming amongst clouds and surges of incense — threw up, as from fountains unfathomable, columns of heart-shattering music.) Choir and anti-choir were filling fast with unknown voices. Thou also, Dying Trumpeter! — with thy love that was victorious, and thy anguish that was finishing — didst enter the tumult; trumpet and echo — farewell love and farewell anguish — rang through the dreadful sanctus. Oh, darkness of the grave! that from the crimson altar and from the fiery font wert visited and searched by the effulgence in the angel's eye — were these indeed thy children? Poms of life, that, from the burials of centuries, rose again to the voice of perfect joy, did ye indeed mingle with the festivals of Death? Lo! as I looked back for seventy leagues through the mighty cathedral, I saw the quick and the dead that sang together to God, together that sang to the generations of man. All the hosts of jubilation, like armies that ride in pursuit, moved with one step. Us, that, with laurelled heads, were passing from the cathedral, they overtook, and, as with a garment, they wrapped us round with thunders greater than our own. As brothers we moved together; to the dawn that advanced — to the stars that fled; rendering thanks to God in the highest — that, having hid His face through one generation behind thick clouds of War, once again was ascending — from the Campo Santo of Waterloo was ascending — in the visions of Peace ; rendering thanks for thee, young girl ! whom, having overshadowed with His ineffable passion of death, suddenly did God relent ; suffered thy angel to turn aside His arm ; and even in thee, sister unknown ! shown to me for a moment only to be hidden forever, found an occasion to glorify His goodness. A thousand times, amongst the phantoms of sleep, have I seen thee entering the gates of the golden-dawn — with the secret word riding before thee — with the armies of the grave behind thee ; seen thee, sinking, rising, raving, despairing ; a thousand times in the worlds of sleep have seen thee followed by God's angel through storms ; through desert seas ; through the darkness of quicksands ; through dreams, and the dreadful revelations that are in dreams — only that at the last, with one sling of His victorious arm, He might snatch thee back from ruin, and might emblazon in thy deliv'rance the endless resurrections of His love !

LEVANA AND OUR LADIES OF SORROW.

OFTENTIMES at Oxford I saw Levana in my dreams. I knew her by her Roman symbols. Who is Levana? Reader, that do not pretend to have leisure for very much scholarship, you will not be angry with me for telling you. Levana was the Roman goddess that performed for the new-born infant the earliest office of ennobling kindness, — typical, by its mode, of that grandeur which belongs to man everywhere, and of that benignity in powers invisible which even in Pagan worlds sometimes descends to sustain it. At the very 10 moment of birth, just as the infant tasted for the first time the atmosphere of our troubled planet, it was laid on the ground. That might bear different interpretations. But immediately, lest so grand a creature should grovel there for more than one instant, either the pater- 15 nal hand, as proxy for the goddess Levana, or some near kinsman, as proxy for the father, raised it upright, bade it look erect as the king of all this world, and presented its forehead to the stars, saying, perhaps, in his heart, “Behold what is greater than yourselves!” This sym- 20 bolic act represented the function of Levana. And that mysterious lady, who never revealed her face (except to me in dreams), but always acted by delegation, had her name from the Latin verb (as still it is the Italian verb) levare, to raise aloft.

5 This is the explanation of Levana. And hence it has arisen that some people have understood by Levana the tutelary power that controls the education of the nursery. She, that would not suffer at his birth even a prefigurative or mimic degradation for her awful ward, far less 10 could be supposed to suffer the real degradation attaching to the non-development of his powers. She, therefore, watches over human education. Now, the word edūco, with the penultimate short, was derived (by a process often exemplified in the crystallization of lan-15 guages) from the word edūco, with the penultimate long. Whatsoever educēs, or develops, educates. By the education of Levana, therefore, is meant,—not the poor machinery that moves by spelling-books and grammars, but by that mighty system of central forces hidden in 20 the deep bosom of human life, which by passion, by strife, by temptation, by the energies of resistance, works forever upon children,—resting not day or night, any more than the mighty wheel of day and night themselves, whose moments, like restless spokes, are glimmering forever as they revolve.

25 If, then, these are the ministries by which Levana works, how profoundly must she reverence the agencies of grief! But you, reader! think,—that children generally are not liable to grief such as mine. There are two senses in the word generally,—the sense of Euclid, where it means universally (or in the whole extent of the genus), and a foolish sense of this world, where it means usually. Now, I am far from saying that children universally are capable of grief like mine. But there are more than you ever heard of who die of grief in this island of ours. I will tell you a common case. The rules of Eton require that a boy on the foundation should be there twelve years: he is superannuated at eighteen, consequently he must come at six. Children torn away from mothers and sisters at that age not unfrequently die. I speak of what I know. The complaint is not entered by the registrar as grief; but that it is. Grief of that sort, and at that age, has killed more than ever have been counted among its martyrs.

Therefore it is that Levana often communes with the powers that shake man's heart: therefore it is that she dotes upon grief. "These ladies," said I softly to myself, on seeing the ministers with whom Levana was conversing, "these are the Sorrows; and they are three in number, as the Graces are three, who dress man's life with beauty: the Parcæ are three, who weave the dark arras of man's life in their mysterious loom always with colors sad in part, sometimes angry with tragic crimson and black; the Furies are three, who visit with retributions called from the other side of the grave offences that walk upon this; and at once even the Muses were but three, who fit the harp, the trumpet, or the lute, to the great burdens of man's impassioned creations. These are the Sorrows, all three of whom I know." The last words I say now; but in Oxford I said, "one of whom I know, and the others too surely I shall know." For already, in my fervent youth, I saw (dimly relieved upon the dark background of my dreams) the imperfect lineaments of the awful sisters. These sisters — by what 5 names shall we call them ?

If I say simply, "The Sorrows," there will be a chance of mistaking the term ; it might be understood of individual sorrow, — separate cases of sorrow, — whereas I want a term expressing the mighty abstractions that 10 incarnate themselves in all individual sufferings of man's heart ; and I wish to have these abstractions presented as impersonations, that is, as clothed with human attributes of life, and with functions pointing to flesh. Let us call them, therefore, Our Ladies of Sorrow. I know
15 them thoroughly, and have walked in all their kingdoms. Three sisters they are, of one mysterious household ; and their paths are wide apart ; but of their dominion there is no end. Them I saw often conversing with Levana, and sometimes about myself. Do they talk,
20 then ? Oh, no ! Mighty phantoms like these disdain the infirmities of language. They may utter voices through the organs of man when they dwell in human hearts, but amongst themselves is no voice nor sound ; eternal silence reigns in their kingdoms. They spoke not, as 25 they talked with Levana ; they whispered not ; they sang not ; though oftentimes methought they might have sung : for I upon earth had heard their mysteries oftentimes deciphered by harp and timbrel, by dulcimer and organ. Like God, whose servants they are, they utter their pleasure not by sounds that perish, or by words that go astray, but by signs in heaven, by changes on earth, by pulses in secret rivers, heraldries painted on darkness, and hieroglyphics written on the tablets of the brain. They wheeled in mazes; I spelled the steps. They telegraphed from afar; I read the signals. They 5 conspired together; and on the mirrors of darkness my eye traced the plots. Theirs were the symbols; mine are the words.

What is it the sisters are? What is it that they do? Let me describe their form and their presence, if form 10 it were that still fluctuated in its outline, or presence it were that forever advanced to the front or forever receded amongst shades.

The eldest of the three is named Mater Lachrymarum, Our Lady of Tears. She it is that night and day raves 15 and moans, calling for vanished faces. She stood in Rama where a voice was heard of lamentation — Rachel weeping for her children, and refused to be comforted. She it was that stood in Bethlehem on the night when Herod's sword swept its nurseries of Innocents, and the 20 little feet were stiffened forever, which, heard at times as they tottered along floors overhead, woke pulses of love in household hearts that were not unmarked in heaven.

Her eyes are sweet and subtle, wild and sleepy, by 25 turns; oftentimes rising to the clouds, oftentimes challenging the heavens. She wears a diadem round her head. And I knew by childish memories that she could go abroad upon the winds when she heard that sobbing of litanies or the thundering of organs, and when she beheld the mustering of summer clouds. ✓ This sister, the elder, it is that carries keys more than papal at her girdle, which open every cottage and every palace. She, to my knowledge, sat all last summer by the bedside of 5 the blind beggar, him that so often and so gladly I talked with, whose pious daughter, eight years old, with the sunny countenance, resisted the temptations of play and village mirth to travel all day long on dusty roads with her afflicted father. For this did God send her a great

10 reward. In the spring-time of the year, and whilst yet her own spring was budding, he recalled her to himself. But her blind father mourns forever over her; still he dreams at midnight that the little guiding hand is locked within his own; and still he wakens to a darkness that 15 is now within a second and a deeper darkness. This Mater Lachrymarum also has been sitting all this winter of 1844-5 within the bedchamber of the Czar, bringing before his eyes a daughter (not less pious) that vanished to God not less suddenly, and left behind her a darkness
20 not less profound. By the power of her keys it is that Our Lady of Tears glides a ghostly intruder into the chambers of sleepless men, sleepless women, sleepless children, from Ganges to the Nile, from Nile to Mississippi. And her, because she is the first-born of her
25 house, and has the widest empire, let us honor with the title of "Madonna."

The second sister is called Mater Suspiriorum, Our Lady of Sighs. She never scales the clouds, nor walks abroad upon the winds. She wears no diadem. And her eyes, if they were ever seen, would be neither sweet nor subtile; no man could read their story; they would be found filled with perishing dreams, and with wrecks of forgotten delirium. But she raises not her eyes; her head, on which sits a dilapidated turban, droops forever, forever fastens on the dust. She weeps not. She 5 groans not. But she sighs inaudibly at intervals. Her sister Madonna is oftentimes stormy and frantic, raging in the highest against heaven, and demanding back her darlings. But Our Lady of Sighs never clamors, never defies, dreams not of rebellious aspirations. She is 10 humble to abjectness. Hers is the meekness that belongs to the hopeless. Murmur she may, but it is in her sleep. Whisper she may, but it is to herself in the twilight. Mutter she does at times, but it is in solitary places that are desolate as she is desolate, in ruined 15 cities, and when the sun has gone down to his rest. This sister is the visitor of the Pariah, of the Jew, of the bondsman to the oar in the Mediterranean galleys; of the English criminal in Norfolk Island, blotted out from the books of remembrance in sweet far-off Eng- 20 land; of the baffled penitent reverting his eyes forever upon a solitary grave, which to him seems the altar overthrown of some past and bloody sacrifice, on which altar no obligations can now be availing, whether toward pardon that he might implore, or toward reparation that 25 he might attempt. Every slave that at noonday looks up to the tropical sun with timid reproach, as he points with one hand to the earth, our general mother, but for him a step-mother, — as he points with the other hand to the Bible, our general teacher, but against him sealed and sequestered; every woman sitting in darkness, without love to shelter her head, or hope to illumine her solitude because the heaven-born instincts kindling in her nature germs of holy affections, which God implanted in 5 her womanly bosom, having been stifled by social necessities, now burn sullenly to waste, like sepulchral lamps amongst the ancients; every nun defrauded of her unreturning May-time by wicked kinsman, whom God will judge; every captive in every dungeon; all that are

10 betrayed, and all that are rejected; outcasts by traditional law, and children of hereditary disgrace, — all these walk with Our Lady of Sighs. She also carries a key; but she needs it little, for her kingdom is chiefly amongst the tents of Shem, and the houseless vagrant
15 of every clime. Yet in the very highest ranks of man she finds chapels of her own; and even in glorious England there are some that, to the world, carry their heads as proudly as the reindeer, who yet secretly have received her mark upon their foreheads.

20 But the third sister, who is also the youngest — Hush! whisper whilst we talk of her! Her kingdom is not large, or else no flesh should live; but within that kingdom all power is hers. Her head, turreted like that of Cybele, raises almost beyond the reach of sight. She 25 droops not; and her eyes rising so high might be hidden by distance. But, being what they are, they cannot be hidden; through the treble veil of crape which she wears, the fierce light of a blazing misery, that rests not for matins or for vespers, for noon of day or noon of night, for ebbing or for flowing tide, may be read from the very ground. She is the defier of God. She also is the mother of lunacies, and the suggestress of suicides. Deep lie the roots of her power; but narrow is the nation that she rules. For she can approach only those in whom a profound nature has been upheaved by central convulsions; in whom the heart trembles and the brain rocks under conspiracies of tempest from without and tempest from within. Madonna moves with uncertain steps, fast or slow, but still with tragic grace. Our Lady of Sighs creeps timidly and stealthily. But this youngest sister moves with incalculable motions, bounding, and with a tiger's leaps. She carries no key; for, though coming rarely amongst men, she storms all doors at which she is permitted to enter at all. And her name is Mater Tenebrarum, Our Lady of Darkness. 15

These were the Semnai Theai, or Sublime Goddesses, these were the Eumenides, or Gracious Ladies (so called by antiquity in shuddering propitiation), of my Oxford dreams. Madonna spoke. She spoke by her mysterious hand. Touching my head, she beckoned to Our Lady of Sighs; and what she spoke, translated out of the signs which (except in dreams) no man reads, was this:—

“Lo! here is he whom in childhood I dedicated to my altars. This is he that once I made my darling. Him I led astray, him I beguiled, and from heaven I stole away his young heart to mine. Through me did he become idolatrous; and through me it was, by languishing desires, that he worshipped the worm and prayed to the wormy grave. Holy was the grave to him; lovely was its darkness; saintly its corruption. Him, this young idolater, I have seasoned for thee, dear, gentle Sister of Sighs! Do thou take him now to thy heart, and season him for our dreadful sister. And thou," turning to the Mater Tenebrarum, she said, "wicked

5 sister, that temptest and hatest, do thou take him from her. See that thy sceptre lie heavy on his head. Suffer not woman and her tenderness to sit near him in his darkness. Banish the frailties of hope, wither the relenting of love, scorch the fountains of tears, curse him
10 as only thou canst curse. So shall he be accomplished in the furnace, so shall he see the things that ought not to be seen, sights that are abominable, and secrets that are unutterable. So shall he read elder truths, sad truths, grand truths, fearful truths. So shall he rise again
15 before he dies. And so shall our commission be accomplished which from God we had — to plague his heart until we had unfolded the capacities of his spirit."

DINNER, REAL AND REPUTED.

GREAT misconceptions have always prevailed about the Roman dinner. Dinner [coena] was the only meal which the Romans as a nation took. It was no accident, but arose out of their whole social economy. This I shall endeavor to show by running through the history of a Roman day. Ridentem dicere verum quid vetat? And the course of this review will expose one or two important truths in ancient political economy, which have been too much overlooked.

With the lark it was that the Roman rose. Not that the earliest lark rises so early in Latium as the earliest lark in England; that is, during summer; but then, on the other hand, neither does it ever rise so late. The Roman citizen was stirring with the dawn — which, allowing for the shorter longest day and longer shortest day of Rome, you may call about four in summer — about seven in winter. Why did he do this? Because he went to bed at a very early hour. But why did he do that? By backing in this way, we shall surely back into the very well of truth; always, where it is possible, let us have the pourquoi of the pourquoi. The Roman went to bed early for two remarkable reasons. First,

Because in Rome, built for a martial destiny, every habit of life had reference to the usages of war. Every citizen, if he were not a mere proletarian animal kept at the public cost, with a view to his proles, or offspring, held himself a soldier elect; the more noble he was, the more was his liability to military service; in short, all Rome, and at all times, was consciously "in procinct." Now, it was a principle of ancient warfare, that every hour of daylight had a triple worth, as valued against 10 hours of darkness. That was one reason — a reason suggested by the understanding. But there was a second reason, far more remarkable; and this was a reason suggested by a blind necessity. It is an important fact, that this planet on which we live, this little industrious 15 earth of ours, has developed her wealth by slow stages of increase. She was far from being the rich little globe in Cæsar's days that she is at present. The earth in our days is incalculably richer, as a whole, than in the time of Charlemagne; and at that time she was richer, 20 by many a million of acres, than in the era of Augustus. In that Augustan era we descry a clear belt of cultivation, averaging perhaps six hundred miles in depth, running in a ring-fence about the Mediterranean. This belt, and no more, was in decent cultivation. Beyond 25 that belt there was only a wild Indian cultivation; generally not so much. At present what a difference! We have that very belt, but much richer, all things considered, æquatis æquandis, than in the Roman era, and much beside. The reader must not look to single cases, as that of Egypt and other parts of Africa, but take the whole collectively. On that scheme of valuation, we have the old Roman belt, the circum-Mediterranean girdle not much tarnished, and we have all the rest of Europe to boot. Such being the case, the earth, being (as a whole) in that Pagan era so incomparably poorer, could not in the Pagan era support the expense of maintaining great empires in cold latitudes. Her purse would not reach that cost. Wherever she undertook in those early ages to rear man in great abundance, it must be where nature would consent to work in partnership with herself; where warmth was to be had for nothing; where clothes were not so entirely indispensable but that a ragged fellow might still keep himself warm; where slight shelter might serve; and where the soil, if not absolutely richer in reversionary wealth, was more easily cultured. Nature, in those days of infancy, must come forward liberally, and take a number of shares in every new joint-stock concern before it could move. Man, therefore, went to bed early in those ages, simply because his worthy mother earth could not afford him candles. She, good old lady (or good young lady, for geologists know not whether she is in that stage of her progress which corresponds to gray hairs, or to infancy, or to "a certain age") — she, good lady, would certainly have shuddered to hear any of her nations asking for candles. "Candles, indeed!" she would have said; "who ever heard of such a thing? and with so much excellent daylight running to waste, as I have provided gratis! What will the wretches want next?"

The daylight, furnished gratis, was certainly "undeniable" in its quality, and quite sufficient for all purposes that were honest. Seneca, even in his own luxurious period, called those men lucifugæ, and by 5 other ugly names, who lived chiefly by candle-light. None but rich and luxurious men, nay, even amongst these, none but idlers, did or could live by candle-light. An immense majority of men in Rome never lighted a candle, unless sometimes in the early dawn. And this
10 custom of Rome was the custom also of all nations that lived round the great lake of the Mediterranean. In Athens, Egypt, Palestine, Asia Minor, everywhere, the ancients went to bed, like good boys, from seven to nine o'clock. The Turks and other people, who have suc-
15 ceeded to the stations and the habits of the ancients, do so at this day.

—The Roman, therefore, who saw no joke in sitting round a table in the dark, went off to bed as the darkness began. Everybody did so. Old Numa Pompilius 20 himself was obliged to trundle off in the dusk. Tarquinius might be a very superb fellow; but I doubt whether he ever saw a farthing rushlight. And, though it may be thought that plots and conspiracies would flourish in such a city of darkness, it is to be consid-
25 ered that the conspirators themselves had no more candles than honest men: both parties were in the dark.

Being up, then, and stirring not long after the lark, what mischief did the Roman go about first? Nowadays, he would have taken a pipe or a cigar. But, alas for the ignorance of the poor heathen creatures! they had neither the one nor the other. In this point, I must tax our mother earth with being really too stingy. In the use of candles I approve of her parsimony. Much mischief is brewed by candle-light. But it was coming 5 it too strong to allow no tobacco.

So, after shaving (supposing the age of the Barbati to be passed), what is the first business that our Roman will undertake? Forty to one he is a poor man, born to look upwards to his fellow-men, and not to look down upon 10 anybody but slaves. He goes, therefore, to the palace of some grandee, some top-sawyer of the senatorian order. This great man, for all his greatness, has turned out even sooner than himself. For he also has had no candles and no cigars; and as he well knows that, before 15 the sun looks into his portals, all his halls will be overflowing and buzzing with the matin susurrus of courtiers — the mane salutantes.

It is as much as his popularity is worth to absent himself, or to keep people waiting. But, surely, the 20 reader may think, this poor man he might keep waiting. No, he might not; for, though poor, being a citizen, the man is a gentleman. That was the consequence of keeping slaves. Wherever there is a class of slaves, he that enjoys the jus suffragii (no matter 25 how poor) is a gentleman. The true Latin word for a gentleman is ingenuus, — a freeman and the son of a freeman.

Having paid his court, you will suppose that our friend comes home to breakfast. Not at all; no such

- discovery as "breakfast" had then been made: breakfast was not invented for many centuries after that. Breakfast was not suspected. No prophecy, no type of breakfast, had been published. In fact, it took as much 5 time and research to arrive at that great discovery as at the Copernican system. True it is, reader, that you have heard of such a word as jentaculum; and your dictionary translates that old heathen word by the Christian word breakfast. But dictionaries are dull 10 deceivers. Between jentaculum and breakfast the differences are as wide as between a horse-chestnut and a chestnut horse; differences in the time when, in the place where, in the manner how, but pre-eminently in the thing which.
- 15 Galen is a good authority upon such a subject, since, if (like other Pagans) he ate no breakfast himself, in some sense he may be called the cause of breakfast to other men, by treating of those things which could safely be taken upon an empty stomach. As to the time, he 20 (like many other authors) says, about the third, or at farthest, about the fourth hour; and so exact is he, that he assumes the day to lie exactly between six and six o'clock, and to be divided into thirteen equal portions. So the time will be a few minutes before nine, or a few 25 minutes before ten, in the forenoon. That seems fair enough. But it is not time with respect to its location that we are concerned with, so much as time in respect to its duration. Now, heaps of authorities take it for granted that you are not to sit down—you are to stand; and, as to the place, that any place will do—"any corner of the forum," says Galen, "any corner that you fancy;" which is like referring a man for his salle à manger to Westminster Hall or Fleet Street. Augustus, in a letter still surviving, tells us that he jentabat, or took his jentaculum, in his carriage; sometimes in a 5 wheeled carriage (inessedo), sometimes in a litter or palanquin (in lectica). This careless and disorderly way as to time, and place, and other circumstances of haste, sufficiently indicate the quality of the meal you are to expect. Already you are "sagacious of your quarry 10 from so far." Not that we would presume, excellent reader, to liken you to Death, or to insinuate that you are a "grim feature." But would it not make a saint "grim" to hear of such preparations for the morning meal? And then to hear of such consummations as 15 panis siccus, dry bread; or (if the learned reader thinks it will taste better in Greek), αγρος ξηρος! And what may this word dry happen to mean? "Does it mean stale?" says Salmasius. "Shall we suppose," says he, in querulous words, "molli et recenti opponi," that it is placed in 20 antithesis to soft and new bread, what English sailors call "soft tommy"? and from antithesis conclude it to be "durum et non recens coctum eoque sicciores"? Hard and stale, and in that proportion more arid? Not quite so bad as that, we hope. Or again, — "siccum pro 25 biscoccto, ut hodie vocamus, sumemus"? By hodie Salmasius means, amongst his countrymen of France, where biscocctus is verbatim reproduced in the word bis (twice), cuit (baked); whence our own biscuit. Biscuit might do very well, could we be sure that it was cabin biscuit;

but Salmasius argues that—in this case he takes it to mean “brecellatum, qui est panis nauticus,” that is, the ship company’s biscuit, broken with a sledge-hammer. In Greek, for the benefit again of the learned reader, it is termed διπυρος, indicating that it has passed twice under the action of fire.

“Well,” you say, “no matter if it had passed through the fires of Moloch; only let us have this biscuit, such as it is.” In good faith, then, fasting reader, you are not likely to see much more than you have seen. It is a very Barmecide feast, we do assure you, this same “jentaculum ;” at which abstinence and patience are much more exercised than the teeth; faith and hope are the chief graces cultivated, together with that species of the magnificum which is founded on the ignotum. But even this biscuit was allowed in the most limited quantities. Speaking of his uncle, Pliny the Younger says, Post solem plerumque lavabatur: deinde gustabat; dormiebat minimum: mox, quasi alio die, studebat in coenae tem-
pus. “After taking the air, generally speaking, he bathed: after that he broke his fast on a morsel of biscuit, and took a very slight siesta: which done, as if awaking to a new day, he set in regularly to his studies, and pursued them to dinner time.” Gustabat here means that nondescript meal which arose at Rome when jentaculum and prandium were fused into one, and that only a taste or mouthful of biscuit, as we shall show further on.

Possibly, however, most excellent reader, like some epicurean traveller, who, in crossing the Alps, finds himself weather-bound at St. Bernard's on Ash-Wednesday, you surmise a remedy: you descry some opening from "the loop-holes of retreat," through which a few delicacies might be insinuated to spread verdure on this arid wilderness of biscuit. But sorry I am to say that, in 5 this case, no relief is hinted at in any ancient author. A grape or two (not a bunch of grapes), a raisin or two, a date, an olive, — these are the whole amount of relief which the chancery of the Roman kitchen granted in such cases. All things here hang together, and prove 10 each other, — the time, the place, the mode, the thing. Well might a man eat standing, or eat in public, such a trifle as this. Go home, indeed, to such a breakfast? You would as soon think of ordering a cloth to be laid in order to eat a peach, or of asking a friend to join you in 15 an orange. No man in his senses makes "two bites of a cherry." So let us pass to the other stages of the day. Only, in taking leave of this morning stage, throw your eyes back with me, Christian reader, upon this truly heathen meal, fit for idolatrous dogs like your Greeks 20 and Romans; survey, through the vista of ages, that thrice accursed biscuit, with half a fig, perhaps, by way of garnish, and a huge hammer by its side, to secure the certainty of mastication by previous comminution. Then turn your eyes to a Christian breakfast — hot rolls, eggs, 25 coffee, beef: but down, down, rebellious visions: we need say no more! You, reader, like myself, will breathe a malediction on the Classical era, and thank your stars for making you a Romanticist. Every morning I thank mine for keeping me back from the Augustan age, and reserving me to a period in which breakfast had been already invented. In the words of Ovid, I say:—

“Prisca juvent alios: ego me nunc denique natum Gratulor. Haec aetas moribus apta meis.”

Our friend, the Roman cit, has therefore thus far, in his progress through life, obtained no breakfast, if he 5 ever contemplated an idea so frantic. But it occurs to you, my faithful reader, that perhaps he will not always be thus unhappy. I could bring wagon loads of sentiments, Greek as well as Roman, which prove, more clearly than the most eminent pikestaff, that, as the
10 wheel of fortune revolves, simply out of the fact that it has carried a man downwards, it must subsequently carry him upwards, no matter what dislike that wheel, or any of its spokes, may bear to that man: non si male nunc sit, et olim sic erit: and that if a man, through
15 the madness of his nation, misses coffee and hot rolls at nine, he may easily run into a leg of mutton at twelve. True it is he may do so: truth is commendable; and I will not deny that a man may sometimes, by losing a breakfast, gain a dinner. Such things have been in vari-
20 ous ages, and will be again, but not at Rome. There were reasons against it. We have heard of men who consider life under the idea of a wilderness, dry as a “remainder biscuit after a voyage:” and who consider a day under the idea of a little life. Life is the macrocosm, or world at 25 large; day is the microcosm, or world in miniature. Consequently, if life is a wilderness, then day, as a little life, is a little wilderness. And this wilderness can be safely traversed only by leaving relays of fountains, or stages for refreshment. Such stages, they conceive, are found in the several meals which Providence has stationed at due intervals through the day, whenever the perverseness of man does not break the chain or derange the order of succession. 5

These are the anchors by which man rides in that billowy ocean between morning and night. The first anchor, viz., breakfast, having given way in Rome, the more need there is that he should pull up by the second: and that is often reputed to be dinner. And as your dictionary, good reader, translated breakfast by that vain word jentaculum, so doubtless it will translate dinner by that still vainer word prandium. Sincerely I hope that your own dinner on this day, and through all time coming, may have a better root in fact and substance than this most visionary of baseless things — the Roman prandium, of which I shall presently show you that the most approved translation is moonshine. 15

Reader, I am anything but jesting here. In the very spirit of serious truth, I assure you that the delusion about jentaculum is even exceeded by this other delusion about prandium. Salmasius himself, for whom a natural prejudice of place and time partially obscured the truth, admits, however, that prandium was a meal which the ancients rarely took; his very words are — raro prandebant veteres. Now, judge for yourself of the good sense which is shown in translating by the word dinner, which must of necessity mean the chief meal, a Roman word which represents a fancy meal, a 25 meal of caprice, a meal which few people took. At this moment, what is the single point of agreement between the noon meal of the English laborer and the evening meal of the English gentleman? what is the single circumstance common to both, which causes us to denominate them by the common name of dinner? It is, that in both we recognize the principal meal of the day, the meal on which is thrown the onus of the day's support. In everything else they are as wide asunder as the poles; but they agree in this one point of their function. Is it credible now, that, to represent such a meal amongst ourselves, we select a Roman word so notoriously expressing a mere shadow, a pure apology, that very few people ever tasted it — nobody sat down to it — not many washed their hands after it, and gradually the very name of it became interchangeable with another name, implying the slightest possible act of tentative tasting? Says Seneca, "After bathing I take a prandium without sitting down to table, and such a prandium as brings after itself no need of washing the hands." No; moonshine as little soils the hands as it oppresses the stomach.

Thus I have brought down our Roman friend to noon-day, or even one hour later than noon, and to this moment the poor man has had nothing to eat. For supposing him to be not impransus, and supposing him jentâsse beside: yet it is evident (I hope) that neither one nor the other means more than it was often called — viz., βουψισμος, or, in plain English, a mouthful. How long do we intend to keep him waiting? Reader, he will dine at three, or (supposing dinner put off to the latest) at four. Dinner was never known to be later than the tenth hour at Rome, which in summer would be past five; but in a far greater proportion of days would be near four in Rome. And so entirely was a Roman the creature of ceremonial usage, that a national mourning would probably have been celebrated, and the "sad augurs" would have been called in to expiate the prodigy, had the general dinner lingered beyond four.

But, meantime, what has our friend been about since 10 perhaps six or seven in the morning? After paying his little homage to his patronus, in what way has he fought with the great enemy Time since then? Why, reader, this illustrates one of the most interesting features in the Roman character. The Roman was the idlest of 15 men. "Man and boy, he was an idler in the land." He called himself and his pals, rerum dominos, gentemque togatum — "the gentry that wore the toga." Yes, a pretty set of gentry they were, and a pretty affair that "toga" was. Just figure to yourself, reader, the picture 20 of a hard working man, with horny hands, like our hedgers, ditchers, porters, etc., setting to work on the high road in that vast sweeping toga, filling with a strong gale like the mainsail of a frigate. Conceive the roars with which this magnificent figure would be 25 received into the bosom of a modern poor-house detachment sent out to attack the stones on some line of road, or a fatigue party of dustmen sent upon secret service. Had there been nothing left as a memorial of the Romans but that one relic — their immeasurable toga — I should have known that they were born and bred to idleness. In fact, except in war, the Roman never did anything at all but sun himself. Uti se apricaret was the final cause of peace in his opinion; in literal truth, 5 that he might make an apricot of himself. The public rations at all times supported the poorest inhabitant of Rome if he were a citizen. Hence it was that Hadrian was so astonished with the spectacle of Alexandria, "civitas opulenta, faecunda, in qua nemo vivat otiosus." 10 Here first he saw the spectacle of a vast city, second only to Rome, where every man had something to do. No poor rates levied upon the rest of the world for the benefit of their own paupers were there distributed gratis. The prodigious spectacle (such it seemed to Hadrian) 15 was exhibited in Alexandria, of all men earning their bread in the sweat of their brow. In Rome only (and in one time in some of the Grecian states), it was the very meaning of citizen that he should vote and be idle. Precisely those were the two things which the Roman, the 20 faex Romuli, had to do — viz., sometimes to vote, and always to be idle.

In these circumstances, where the whole sum of life's duties amounted to voting, all the business man could have was to attend the public assemblies, electioneering 25 or factions. These, and any judicial trial (public or private) that might happen to interest him for the persons concerned, or for the questions at stake, amused him through the morning; that is, from eight till one. He might also extract some diversion from the columnae, or pillars of certain porticoes to which they pasted advertisements. These affiches must have been numerous ; for all the girls in Rome who lost a trinket, or a pet bird, or a lap-dog, took this mode of angling in the great ocean of the public for the missing articles.

But all this time I take for granted that there were no 5 shows in a course of exhibition, either the dreadful ones of the amphitheatre, or the bloodless ones of the circus. If there were, then that became the business of all Romans ; and it was a business which would have occupied him from daylight till the light began to fail. Here we 10 see another effect from the scarcity of artificial light among the ancients. These magnificent shows went on by daylight. However, as there may happen to be no public spectacles, and the courts of political meetings (if not closed altogether by superstition) would at any 15 rate be closed in the ordinary course by twelve or one o'clock, nothing remains for him to do, before returning home, except, perhaps, to attend the palaestra, or some public recitation of a poem written by a friend, but in any case to attend the public baths. For these the time 20 varied ; and many people have thought it tyrannical in some of the Cæsars that they imposed restraints on the time open for the baths ; some, for instance, would not suffer them to open at all before two ; and in any case, if you were later than four or five in the summer, you 25 would have to pay a fine, which most effectually cleaned out the baths of all raff, since it was a sum that John Quires could not have produced to save his life.

And now, at last, bathing finished, and the exercises of the palaestra, at half-past two or three, our friend finds his way home, not again to leave it for that day. He is now a new man, refreshed, oiled with perfumes, his dust washed off by hot water, and ready for enjoyment. These were the things that determined the time

5 for dinner. Had there been no other proof that coena was the Roman dinner, this is an ample one. Now first the Roman was fit for dinner, in a condition of luxurious ease; business over — that day's load of anxiety laid aside — his cuticle, as he delighted to talk, cleansed and 10 polished — nothing more to do or to think of till next morning: he might go and dine, and get drunk with a safe conscience. Besides, if he does not get dinner now, when will he get it? For most demonstrably he has taken nothing yet which comes near in value to that 15 basin of soup which many of ourselves take at the Roman hour of bathing. No; we have kept our man fasting as yet. It is to be hoped that something is coming at last.

Yes, something is coming; dinner is coming, the 20 great meal of "coena;" the meal sacred to hospitality and genial pleasure comes now to fill up the rest of the day, until light fails altogether.

Many people are of opinion that the Romans only understood what the capabilities of dinner were. It is 25 certain that they were the first great people that discovered the true secret and meaning of dinner, the great office which it fulfils, and which we in England are now so generally acting on. Barbarous nations — and none were, in that respect, more barbarous than our own ancestors — made this capital blunder: the brutes, if you asked them what was the use of dinner, what it was meant for, stared at you, and replied — as a horse would reply, if you put the same question about his provender — that it was to give him strength for finishing his work! Therefore, if you point your telescope back to antiquity 5 about twelve or one o'clock in the daytime, you will descry our most worthy ancestors all eating for their very lives, eating as dogs eat — viz., in bodily fear that some other dog will come and take their dinner away. What swelling of the veins in the temples (see Boswell's 10 natural history of Dr. Johnson at dinner)! what intense and rapid deglutition! what odious clatter of knives and plates! what silence of the human voice! what gravity! what fury in the libidinous eyes with which they contemplate the dishes! Positively it was an in- 15 decent spectacle to see Dr. Johnson at dinner. But, above all, what maniacal haste and hurry, as if the fiend were waiting with red-hot pincers to lay hold of the hindmost!

O reader, do you recognize in this abominable picture 20 your respected ancestors and ours? Excuse me for saying, "What monsters!" I have a right to call my own ancestors monsters; and, if so, I must have the same right over yours. For Southey has shown plainly in the "Doctor," that every man having four grandparents in 25 the second stage of ascent, consequently (since each of those four will have had four grandparents) sixteen in the third stage, consequently sixty-four in the fourth, consequently two hundred and fifty-six in the fifth, and so on, it follows that, long before you get to the Conquest, every man and woman then living will be wanted to make up the sum of my separate ancestors; consequently, you must take your ancestors out of the very same fund, or (if you are too proud for that) you must 5 go without ancestors. So that, your ancestors being clearly mine, I have a right in law to call the whole "kit" of them monsters. Quod erat demonstrandum. Really and upon my honor, it makes one, for the moment, ashamed of one's descent; one would wish to dis-

10 herit oneself backward, and (as Sheridan says in the "Rivals") to "cut the connection." I mentioned four tests for determining what meal is, and what is not, dinner: we may now add a fifth — viz., the spirit of festal joy and elegant enjoyment, of anxiety laid aside, and of 15 honorable social pleasure put on like a marriage garment.

And what caused the difference between our ancestors and the Romans? Simply this — the error of interposing dinner in the middle of business, thus courting all 20 the breezes of angry feeling that may happen to blow from the business yet to come, instead of finishing, absolutely closing, the account with this world's troubles before you sit down. That unhappy interpolation ruined all. Dinner was an ugly little parenthesis between two 25 still uglier clauses of a teetotally ugly sentence. Whereas, with us, their enlightened posterity, to whom they have the honor to be ancestors, dinner is a great reaction. There lies my conception of the matter. It grew out of the very excess of evil. When business was moderate, dinner was allowed to divide and bisect

it. When it swelled into that vast strife and agony, as one may call it, that boils along the tortured streets of modern London or other capitals, men begin to see the necessity of an adequate counter-force to push against this overwhelming torrent, and thus maintain the equilibrium. Were it not for the soft relief of a six o'clock dinner, the gentle demeanor succeeding to the boisterous hubbub of the day, the soft glowing lights, the wine, the intellectual conversation, life in London is now come to such a pass, that in two years all nerves would sink 10 before it. But for this periodic reaction the modern business which draws so cruelly on the brain, and so little on the hands, would overthrow that organ in all but those of coarse organization. Dinner it is — meaning by dinner the whole complexity of attendant circum- 15 stances — which saves the modern brain-working man from going mad.

This revolution as to dinner was the greatest in virtue and value ever accomplished. In fact, those are always the most operative revolutions which are brought about 20 through social or domestic changes. A nation must be barbarous, neither could it have much business, which dined in the morning. They could not be at ease in the morning. So much must be granted: every day has its separate quantum, its dose of anxiety, that could not be 25 digested as soon as noon. No man will say it. He, therefore, who dined at noon, showed himself willing to sit down squalid as he was, with his dress unchanged, his cares not washed off. And what follows from that? Why, that to him, to such a canine or cynical specimen of the genus homo, dinner existed only as a physical event, a mere animal relief, a purely carnal enjoyment. For in what, I demand, did this fleshly creature differ from the carrion crow, or the kite, or the 5 vulture, or the cormorant? But surely, of the rabid animal who is caught dining at noonday, the homo ferus, who affronts the meridian sun like Thyestes and Atreus, by his inhuman meals, we are, by parity of reason, entitled to say, that he has a "maw" (so has Milton's Death), 10 but nothing resembling a stomach. And to this vile man a philosopher would say — "Go away, sir, and come back to me two or three centuries hence, when you have learned to be a reasonable creature, and to make that physico-intellectual thing out of dinner which it was 15 meant to be, and is capable of becoming."

In Henry VII.'s time the court dined at eleven in the forenoon. But even that hour was considered so shockingly late in the French court that Louis XII. actually had his gray hairs brought down with sorrow to the 20 grave, by changing his regular hour of half-past nine to eleven, in gallantry to his young English bride. He fell a victim to late hours in the forenoon. In Cromwell's time they dined at one P.M. One century and a half had carried them on by two hours. Doubtless, old cooks 25 and scullions wondered what the world would come to next. Our French neighbors were in the same predicament. But they far surpassed us in veneration for the meal. They actually dated from it. Dinner constituted the great era of the day. L'après diner is almost the sole date which you find in Cardinal De Retz's memoires of the Fronde. Dinner was their Hegire—dinner was their line in traversing the ocean of day; they crossed the equator when they dined. Our English Revolution came next; it made some little difference, I have heard people say, in church and state; I dare say it did, 5 like enough, but its great effects were perceived in dinner. People now dine at two. So dined Addison for his last thirty years; so, through his entire life, dined Pope, whose birth was coeval with the Revolution. Precisely as the Rebellion of 1745 arose, did people (but 10 observe, very great people) advance to four P.M. Philosophers, who watch the "semina rerum" and the first symptoms of change, had perceived this alteration singing in the upper air like a coming storm some little time before. About the year 1740, Pope complains of 15 Lady Suffolk's dining so late as four. Young people may bear those things, he observed; but as to himself, now turned of fifty, if such things went on, if Lady Suffolk would adopt such strange hours, he must really absent himself from Marble Hill. Lady Suffolk had a 20 right to please herself; he himself loved her. But, if she would persist, all that remained for a decayed poet was respectfully to cut his stick, and retire. Whether Pope ever put up with four o'clock dinners again, I have vainly sought to fathom. Some things advance continu- 25 ously, like a flood or a fire, which always make an end of A, eat and digest it, before they go on to B. Other things advance per saltum—they do not silently cancer their way onwards, but lie as still as a snake after they have made some notable conquest, then unobserved they make themselves up "for mischief," and take a flying bound onwards. Thus advanced Dinner, and by these fits got into the territory of evening. And ever as it made a motion onwards, it found the nations more civilized (else the change could not have been effected), and co-operated in raising them to a still higher civilization. The next relay on that line of road, the next repeating frigate, is Cowper in his poem on "Conversation." He speaks of four o'clock as still the elegant hour for dinner — the hour for the lautiores and the lepidi homines. Now this might be written about 1780 or a little earlier; perhaps, therefore, just one generation after Pope's Lady Suffolk. But then Cowper was living amongst the rural gentry, not in high life; yet, again, Cowper was nearly connected by blood with the eminent Whig house of Cowper, and acknowledged as a kinsman.

About twenty-five years after this, we may take Oxford as a good exponent of the national advance. As a magnificent body of "foundations," endowed by kings, nursed by queens, and resorted to by the flower of the national youth, Oxford ought to be elegant and even splendid in her habits. Yet, on the other hand, as a grave seat of learning, and feeling the weight of her position in the commonwealth, she is slow to move; she is inert, as she should be, having the functions of resistance assigned to her against the popular instinct (surely active enough) of movement. Now, in Oxford, about 1804–5, there was a general move in the dinner hour. Those colleges who dined at three, of which there were still several, now began to dine at four; those who had dined at four, now translated their hour to five. These continued good general hours till about Waterloo. After that era, six, which had been somewhat of a gala hour, was promoted to the fixed station of dinner time in ordinary; and there, perhaps, it will rest through centuries. 5 For a more festal dinner, seven, eight, nine, ten, have all been in requisition since then; but I am not aware of any man's habitually dining later than ten P.M., except in that classical case recorded by Mr. Joseph Miller, of an Irishman who must have dined much later than ten, 10 because his servant protested, when others were enforcing the dignity of their masters by the lateness of their dinner hours, that his master invariably dined "to-morrow."

Were the Romans not as barbarous as our own ancestors at one time? Most certainly they were; in their primitive ages they took their coena at noon; that was before they had laid aside their barbarism; before they shaved: it was during their barbarism, and in consequence of their barbarism, that they timed their coena 20 thus unreasonably. And this is made evident by the fact, that, so long as they erred in the hour, they erred in the attending circumstances. At this period they had no music at dinner, no festal graces, and no reposing on sofas. They sat bolt upright in chairs, and were as 25 grave as our ancestors, as rabid, as libidinous in ogling the dishes, and doubtless as furiously in haste.

With us the revolution has been equally as complex. We do not, indeed, adopt the luxurious attitude of semi-recumbency; our climate makes that less requisite; and,

moreover, the Romans had no knives and forks, which could scarcely be used in that recumbent posture; they ate with their fingers from dishes already cut up—whence the peculiar force of Seneca's post quod non sunt lavendae manus. But exactly as our dinner has advanced towards evening, have we and has that advanced in circumstances of elegance, of taste, of intellectual value. This by itself would be much. Infinite would be the gain for any people, that it had ceased to 10 be brutal, animal, fleshly; ceased to regard the chief meal of the day as a ministration only to an animal necessity; that they had raised it to a higher office; associated it with social and humanizing feelings, with manners, with graces moral and intellectual: moral in 15 the self-restraint; intellectual in the fact, notorious to all men, that the chief arenas for the easy display of intellectual power are at our dinner tables. But dinner has now even a greater function than this; as the fervor of our day's business increases, dinner is continually 20 more needed in its office of a great reaction. I repeat, that, at this moment, but for the daily relief of dinner, the brain of all men who mix in the strife of capitals would be unhinged and thrown off its centre.

My object has been to point the eye to this fact; to 25 show uses imperfectly suspected in a recurring accident of life; to show a steady tendency to that consummation, by holding up as in a mirror, a series of changes, corresponding to our own series with regard to the same chief meal, silently going on in a great people of antiquity.

P. 33, l. 9. Napoleon. De Quincey detested the character of Napoleon. In his essay on Charlemagne he styles the Corsican "the sole barbarian of his time: presenting in his deficiencies the picture of a low mechanic, and in his positive qualities the violence and brutality of a savage."

P. 33, l. 17. Suffrein, Saint Tropez. A French admiral who in 1780 captured twelve British merchant vessels, and in 1781 defeated the British admiral Johnstone.

P. 34, l. 7. Champenoise. A native of Champagne.

P. 34, l. 10. Cis, this side of. Trans, beyond.

P. 34, l. 25. Locus. A place, or point.

P. 35, l. 5. That odious man's pigsty. The cause of De Quincey's "systematic hatred of d'Arc" is given on p. 44.

P. 35, l. 19. Three great successive battles. Rudolf of Lorraine and his relative, the Count of Bar, fell at Crécy. Frederick of Lorraine was slain at Agincourt. Bajazet I. defeated the Christian army at Nicopolis, in 1396. (For Crécy and Agincourt see note to p. 36, l. 25.)

P. 35, l. 28. Fleurs de Lis. The lilies of France.

P. 36, l. 25. Crécy, Poitiers, and Agincourt were three great battles in the One Hundred Years' War, in each of which the English defeated the French with great slaughter, especially of the French nobility.

Crécy was fought August 26, 1346, Edward III. completely routing a French army three times as numerous as his own.

At Poitiers (or Poictiers) September 19, 1356, King John of France was defeated and captured by Edward the Black Prince, who had also greatly distinguished himself at Crécy ten years before.

Agincourt (or Azincourt) was fought October 25, 1415, when Joan of Arc was probably four years old. In this battle Henry V., with an army of half-starved men, defeated a French army of probably sixty thousand, commanded by Constable d'Albert. "Eleven thousand Frenchmen lay dead on the field, and more than a hundred princes and great lords were among the fallen."

P. 37, l. 6. The madness of the poor king. Charles VI. reigned, nominally, from 1368 to 1422. During his first fit of insanity, which was believed to have been induced by the sudden appearance of an unknown man, as here related by De Quincey, he killed four of his attendants. An accident by which he nearly lost his life caused, the next year, a second fit, from which he never entirely recovered. The king's condition afforded an opportunity to some of the great nobles to carry on hostilities with each other. War, assassinations, famine, and plague destroyed thousands of lives during the reign of this wretched monarch.

P. 37, l. 24. The termination of the Crusades. The professed purpose of the Crusades was to deliver the Holy Land from the dominion of the Infidel. For nearly two hundred years (from 1096 to 1271) the crusading spirit burned with greater or less enthusiasm. The Crusades failed to secure the permanent occupation of Palestine by the Christians; but they prolonged the existence of the Eastern empire for nearly four centuries, and saved eastern Europe from Mahometan conquest. "The ulterior results of the Crusades were the breaking up of the feudal system, the abolition of serfdom, the supremacy of a common law over the independent jurisdiction of chiefs who claimed the right of private wars." — Encyc. Brit.

P. 37, l. 25. The destruction of the Templars. The order of Knights Templars was the most renowned of the three great military orders founded in the twelfth century for the defense of the Latin kingdom of Jerusalem. Their wealth and political power led to their suppression, with great cruelties, 1307-1312.

P. 37, l. 25. The papal interdicts. An interdict is a decree of a pope, of a bishop, or of an ecclesiastical council, forbidding administration of the sacraments, celebration of public worship, and use of the burial service.

P. 37, l. 26. The house of Anjou. The pathetic struggle of Margaret of Anjou to place her son Edward on the English throne, to which he was justly entitled, is an illustration of the heroic but unsuccessful lives of many members of this house.

P. 37, l. 26. The Emperor. Sigismund, Emperor of Germany from 1433 to 1437. His assent to the burning of John Huss, to whom he had given a safe conduct, led to the Hussite War of sixteen years.

P. 37, l. 29. The colossal figure of feudalism. "Feudalism depended on the superiority of the mounted noble to the unmounted churl: its fighting power lay in its knighthood. But the English yeomen and small freeholders who bore the bow in the national fyrd [the male population able to bear arms] had raised their weapons into a terrible engine of war: in the English archers, Edward carried a new class of soldiers to the fields of France. The churl had struck down the noble: the yeoman proved more than a match for the knight. From the day of Crécy feudalism tottered slowly but surely to its grave."—J. R. Green.

P. 38, l. 4. Spectacle of a double pope. "For a period of thirty-eight years Christian Europe was scandalized by the contentions of two rival popes."—Encyc. Brit.

P. 38, l. 6. Which the creature of hell. To the believer in either of the rival popes, the other pope was necessarily an impostor. In 1402 there were three popes, all of whom were deposed by a general council in 1418.

P. 39, l. 8. Roman martyrology. Records of the lives, sufferings, and deaths of the martyrs of the Roman church.

P. 39, l. 9. Miserere. "Have mercy." The first word of the Latin version of the fifty-first psalm, usually sung for penitential acts.

P. 39, l. 11. Te Deum Laudamus. "We praise thee, O God." The first words of an ancient hymn frequently used on joyful and triumphant occasions.

P. 39, l. 22. The licensed victualler. The tavern-keeper.

P. 40, l. 16. The Vosges. The disastrous campaign of 1870, which overthrew the second empire, again attracted attention to this region.

P. 40, l. 25. Carlovingian. Descended from Charlemagne.

P. 41, l. 17. Sir Roger de Coverley. A genial character in The Spectator.

P. 42, l. 15. Bergereta. A Shepherdess. A Latinized form of the French bergerette.

P. 42, l. 25. Hideous scene. Such "hideous scenes" are common in several European countries in the year of grace 1892.

P. 43, l. 23. Friday. Robinson Crusoe's domesticated savage.

P. 44, l. 6. "Chevalier, as-tu donné au cochon à manger?" "Chevalier, have you fed the hog?" "Ma fille, as-tu donné au cochon à manger?" "My daughter, have you fed the hog?" "Pucelle d'Orléans, as-tu sauvé les fleurs-de-lys?" "Maid of Orleans, have you saved the kingdom?"

P. 44, l. 19. The Oriflamme of France. The ancient royal standard of France.

"Press where you see my white plume shine, amid the ranks of war,
And be your oriflamme, to-day, the helmet of Navarre."

MACAULAY: The Battle of Ivry.

"The oriflamme was a standard erected to denote that no quarter would be given. It is said to have been of red silk, adorned and beaten with very broad and fair lilies of gold, and bordered about with gold and vermillion. Philip is said by some historians to have erected the oriflamme at Cressy, where Edward in return raised up his burning dragon,—the English signal for no quarter. The oriflamme was originally used only in wars against the infidels; for it was a sacred banner, and believed to have been sent from heaven."—Southey.

P. 45, l. 12. Southey's "Joan of Arc." This poem was written by Southey when he was nineteen years of age. Southey boasts that he wrote all but three hundred lines of it in six weeks; and describes it as a poem "crudely conceived, rashly prefaced, and prematurely hurried into the world."

P. 45, l. 22. Coup d'essai. First attempt.

P. 45, l. 29. She "pricks for sheriffs." An ancient ceremony, in which the names of the persons chosen to be sheriffs are pricked with a pin.

P. 46, l. 2. Happy Lady of the Islands and the Orient. De Quincey thus prophetically anticipates the title assumed by Victoria in 1876,—"Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, and Empress of India."

P. 46, l. 18. "On the throne," etc. These lines are from the first edition of Southey's "Joan of Arc." The later editions read:—

"Upon the throne
Let some one take his seat, and personate
My presence, while I mingle in the train."

The "juvenile effort of Southey," as De Quincey describes the poem, thus presents this dramatic incident:—

"Soon is the court convened: the jewelled crown
Shines on a courtier's head. Amid the train
The monarch undistinguished takes his place, Expectant of the event. The Virgin comes,
And, as the Bastard led her to the throne,
Quick glancing o'er the mimic majesty,
With gesture and with look like one inspired
She fixed her eye on Charles: 'Thou art the king!'
Then, in a tone that thrilled all hearts, pursued:
'I come, the appointed Minister of Heaven,
To wield a sword before whose fated edge
Far, far from Orleans shall the English wolves Speed their disastrous flight. Monarch of France!
Send thou the tidings over all the realm,—
Great tidings of deliverance and of joy;
The maid is come, the missioned maid, whose hand
Shall in the consecrated walls of Rheims
Crown thee, anointed king.'"

Book III., 235-252.

P. 46, l. 20. Un peu forte. A little strong.

P. 47, l. 9. Oil from the sacred ampulla. Ampulla is a Latin word meaning a small jar or flask. In mediæval church Latin it denotes a vessel designed to contain consecrated oil. The word is used in the coronation service of English sovereigns. Thus, when Victoria was crowned, "The Dean of Westminster, taking the ampulla and spoon from off the altar, holdeth them ready, pouring some of the holy oil into the spoon, and with it the archbishop anointeth the Queen in the form of a cross." The most celebrated ampulla in history is that from which the kings of France were anointed at Rheims, which, according to a national legend, was brought from heaven by an angel for the coronation of Clovis in 482.

P. 47, l. 11. The English boy. Henry VI., son of Henry V., was proclaimed king of England and France in 1422, at the age of nine months. The dauphin was crowned at Poitiers, as Charles VII., in the same year. Henry VI. was crowned at Westminster in 1429, and at Paris in 1430.

By the treaty of Troyes, 1420, the dauphin (afterwards Charles VII.) was disinherited, and Henry V. declared heir to the crown of France, and regent during the life of Charles VI. This treaty was solemnly ratified by Charles VI., and confirmed by the States General of France. Henry V. married Catharine, the eldest daughter of Charles VI. Henry V. and Charles VI. both died in 1422.

P. 47, l. 14. The ovens of Rheims. Rheims is "famous for its biscuit and gingerbread." In the cathedral of Notre Dame, in Rheims, the ancient kings of France were crowned. Rheims was an important town in the time of Cæsar.

P. 47, l. 21. Appalled the doctors. In later editions of Southey's poem this is changed to—

"The doctors stood astonished, and somehow They listened still in wonder."

P. 47, l. 27. Tindal's "Christianity as Old as the Creation" was published in 1730.

P. 47, l. 29. A parte ante. From something already past.

P. 48, l. 1. Cottle. The Bristol publisher of the first edition of Southey's "Joan of Arc."

P. 48, l. 16. Paradise Regained, Book I., 196-206.

P. 50, l. 15. Coup de main. An unexpected blow.

P. 52, l. 14. "Nolebat uti ense suo, aut quemquem interficere." "She did not wish to use her sword, or to kill any one."

P. 53, l. 18. "She was made prisoner by the Burgundians." Hume says, "The common opinion was that the French officers, finding the merit of every victory ascribed to her, had, in envy of her renown, by which they themselves were so much eclipsed, willingly exposed her to this fatal accident."

P. 53, l. 19. Surrendered to the English. She was sold to the English for ten thousand francs.

P. 53, l. 23. Bishop of Beauvais. Pierre Cauchon, Rector of the University at Paris, and devoted to the interests of the English party.

P. 53, l. 25. Bishop that art, etc. Probably suggested by the witches' address to Macbeth: "Glamis thou art, and Cawdor, and shalt be what thou art promised." Macbeth, Act I., 3 and 5.

P. 53, l. 28. A triple crown. The pope's tiara consists of a tall cap of golden cloth, encircled by three coronets, and surmounted by a ball and cross of gold.

P. 56, l. 24. Nostalgia. Homesickness.

P. 57, l. 25. Woman, sister. These words introduce a celebrated passage.

P. 58, l. 3. From the four winds. "Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live."—Ezekiel xxxvii. 9.

P. 58, l. 16. Tellurian. Inhabitants of tellus, the earth.

P. 58, l. 20. Luxor. A magnificent ruin in ancient Thebes.

P. 59, l. 6. Marie Antoinette. Daughter of Maria Theresa of Austria, and queen of Louis XVI., beheaded October 16, 1793.

P. 59, l. 11. Charlotte Corday, believing that she should thereby free her country from the tyranny of the revolutionists, killed Marat, July 15, 1793. Two days afterwards she was guillotined, meeting death with calmness.

P. 60, l. 18. Grafton. Grafton's Chronicle was published in 1569.

P. 60, l. 22. Holinshead. Holinshead's Chronicle was published in 1587. It thus describes the maid: "Of favor was she counted like-some: of person stronglie made, and manlie: of courage, great, hardie, and stout withall."

De Serres, an old writer, says, "She had a modest countenance, sweet, civill, and resolute."

P. 61, l. 17. Elder Christian martyrs. The first persecution of the Christians by Nero was designed by that tyrant to cast upon them the odium of the burning of his capital. Rome, tolerant of all other religions, was hostile to Christianity. The Roman emperor was regarded as the divine head of the Roman state; and the Christian abhorrence of idolatry and polytheism was considered as enmity to the empire. Even Aurelian, "the noblest of pagans, the crown and flower of Stoicism," deemed it his duty to sanction the extermination of a sect which he regarded as composed of atheists and enemies to his government.

P. 62, l. 21. A priori. Reasoning a priori deduces conclusions from definitions already formed, or from principles known or assumed.

P. 62, l. 23. Ergo. Therefore.

P. 62, l. 27. Onus. Weight. Onus probandi, the burden, or duty, of proving.

P. 66, l. 16. Regent of France. John, Duke of Bedford, brother of Henry V. "Ingenious for war as in political capacity, John was hardly inferior to Henry himself."—J. R. Green.

P. 66, l. 16. Lord of Winchester. Cardinal Winchester, the only English member of the court that condemned Joan.

P. 67, l. 7. Who is this that cometh from Domrémy? "Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah?" Isaiah lxiii. 1. Like most great English authors, De Quincey shows familiarity with the Bible.

NOTES TO "THE ENGLISH MAIL-COACH."

P. 69, l. 6. Vast distances. "One case was familiar to mail-coach travellers, where two mails in opposite directions, north and south, starting the same minute from points six hundred miles apart, met almost constantly at a particular bridge which bisected the total distance." — De Quincey.

See note to page 75, line 16.

P. 69, l. 21. Trafalgar. A celebrated naval battle off Cape Trafalgar, on the coast of Spain, October 21, 1805, in which the English fleet under Admiral Nelson defeated the combined French and Spanish fleets.

P. 69, l. 21. Salamanca. A city in Spain, near which Wellington defeated the French under Marmont, July 22, 1812.

P. 69, l. 22. Vittoria. Another Spanish city, near which, June 21, 1813, Wellington "inflicted on the French a defeat which drove them in utter rout across the Pyrenees." — J. R. Green.

P. 69, l. 23. Waterloo. One of the great battles of the world, in which Wellington defeated Napoleon in person, June 16, 1815. Many monuments and street-names in London bear witness to the deep impression made on the English people by the struggle with Napoleon.

P. 70, l. 21. Non magna loquimur. We do not talk of great things.

P. 70, l. 22. Magna vivimus. We experience great things; strictly, we live great things.

P. 71, l. 14. Nile. The French fleet which had escorted Napoleon and his army to Egypt was destroyed by Nelson in Aboukir Bay, August 1, 1798.

P. 73, l. 8. Attelage. Team.

P. 74, l. 3. Laurels in their hats. For many centuries the laurel has been the emblem of victory.

P. 75, l. 6. Badajoz. A Spanish city stormed by Wellington in 1812.

P. 75, l. 16. Three hundred. "Of necessity this scale of measurement, to an American, if he happens to be a thoughtless man, must sound ludicrous. Accordingly, I remember a case in which an American writer indulges himself in the luxury of a little fibbing, by ascribing to an Englishman a pompous account of the Thames, constructed entirely upon American ideas of grandeur, and concluding in something like these terms: 'And, sir, arriving at London, this mighty father of rivers attains a breadth of at least two furlongs, having, in its winding course, travelled the astonishing distance of one hundred and seventy miles.' . . . The glory of the Thames is measured by the destiny of the population to which it ministers, by the commerce which it supports, by the grandeur of the empire in which, though far from the largest, it is the most influential stream. Upon some such scale, and not by a transfer of Columbian standards, is the course of our English mails to be valued." — De Quincey.

P. 75, l. 22. The City. The old central part of London, about a square mile in extent, is called The City; to this area the jurisdiction of the Lord Mayor of London is limited.

P. 77, l. 16. Barnet. A market town eleven miles from London, on the great northern road.

P. 79, l. 3. Fey. Condemned to a sudden or violent death.

P. 79, l. 28. Talavera. A town in Spain, where Wellington defeated the French, July 27, 28, 1809.

P. 80, l. 5. Peninsular army. The British army in Spain.

P. 84, l. 18. Jus domini. The law of ownership.

P. 84, l. 28. Jus gentium. The law of nations.

P. 85, l. 15. Monstrum horrendum. Virgil's Æneid, Book III., line 658. De Quincey translates it. The reference is to Polyphemus, one of the Cyclops, whose eye was destroyed by Ulysses. Odyssey, Book IX., 514 et seq. Æneid, Book III., 630 et seq.

P. 85, l. 19. Calendars. Three disguised princes, each of whom had lost his right eye.

P. 85, l. 28. Al Sirat. In Mahometan theology, the bridge over Hades, its width that of a sword's edge, which souls must cross on their way to Paradise.

P. 88, l. 1. Confluent. "Suppose a capital Y (the Pythagorean letter): Lancaster at the foot of the letter; Liverpool at the top of the right branch; Manchester at the top of the left; proud Preston at the centre where the two branches unite. It is thirty-three miles along either of the two branches; it is twenty-two miles along the stem—viz., from Preston in the middle to Lancaster at the root. There's a lesson in geography for the reader." — De Quincey.

P. 88, l. 7. Apollo. The Roman god of light, prophecy, music, poetry, the arts and sciences. Apollo was often confounded with the Greek god Helios (the sun), who is represented as driving four fire-breathing steeds.

P. 88, l. 8. Aurora. The Roman personification of Eos, the Greek goddess of the dawn. She yokes her horses, Lampetus and Phaethon, to her chariot, and drives to open the gates of heaven for Helios.

P. 88, l. 12. Pagan Pantheon. All the gods of the pagan mythology.

P. 89, l. 24. Sigh-born. "I owe the suggestion of this word to an obscure remembrance of a beautiful phrase in 'Giraldus Cambrensis,' — viz., suspiciosa cogitationes." — De Quincey.

P. 92, l. 20. Wrong side of the road. "It is true that, according to the law of the case as established by legal precedents, all carriages were required to give way before royal equipages, and therefore before the mail as one of them. But this only increased the danger, as being a regulation very imperfectly made known, very unequally enforced, and therefore often embarrassing the movements on both sides." — De Quincey.

P. 92, l. 23. Quartering. "This is the technical word, and, I presume, derived from the French cartayer, to evade a rut, or any obstacle." — De Quincey.

P. 95, l. 8. Shout of Achilles. After the Trojans had slain Patroclus, and were driving the hard-pressed Greeks to their ships, Achilles, directed by Juno, showed himself to the enemy.

"There he stood,
And shouted loudly; Pallas joined her voice,
And fear infused in all the Trojan host."

Iliad, Book XVIII.

P. 101, l. 2. Averted signs. "I read the course and changes of the lady's agony in the succession of her involuntary gestures; but it must be remembered that I read all this from the rear, never once catching the lady's full face, and even her profile imperfectly."— De Quincey. The expression has in it a suggestion of death.

P. 101, l. 5. Woman's Ionic form. The Ionic column "symbolizes the fine proportions and the elegance of woman."— Vitruvius.

P. 102, l. 23. Corymbi. The Latin plural of corymb, a cluster; a form of inflorescence.

P. 108, l. 2. Campo Santo. "It is probable that most of my readers will be acquainted with the history of the Campo Santo (or cemetery), at Pisa, composed of earth brought from Jerusalem for a bed of sanctity, as the highest prize which the noble piety of crusaders could ask or imagine. To readers who are unacquainted with England, or who (being English) are yet unacquainted with the cathedral cities of England, it may be right to mention that the graves within-side the cathedrals often form a flat pavement over which carriages and horses might run; and perhaps a boyish remembrance of one particular cathedral, across which I had seen passengers walk, and burdens carried, as, about two centuries back, they were through the middle of St. Paul's, in London, may have assisted my dream."— De Quincey.

In his revision of his writings in 1853, the author thus writes of "The English Mail Coach:" Thirty-seven years ago, or rather more, accident made me, in the dead of night, and of a night memorably solemn, the solitary witness to an appalling scene, which threatened instant death, in a shape the most terrific, to two young people whom I had no means of assisting, except in so far as I was able to give them a most hurried warning of their danger; but even that not till they stood within the very shadow of the catastrophe, being divided from the most frightful of deaths by scarcely more, if more at all, than seventy seconds.

Such was the scene, such in its outline, from which the whole of this paper radiates as a natural expression. The scene is circumstantially narrated in Section the Second, entitled "The Vision of Sudden Death."

But a movement of horror and of spontaneous recoil from this dreadful scene naturally carried the whole of that scene, raised and idealized, into my dreams, and very soon into a rolling succession of dreams. The actual scene, as looked down upon from the box of the mail, was transformed into a dream, as tumultuous and changing as a musical fugue. This troubled dream is circumstantially reported in Section the Third, entitled "Dream Fugue upon the Theme of Sudden Death." What I had beheld from my seat upon the mail, — the scenical strife of action and passion, of anguish and fear, as I had there witnessed them moving in ghostly silence; this duel between life and death narrowing itself to a point of such exquisite evanescence as the collision neared, — all these elements of the scene blended, under the law of association, with the previous and permanent features of distinction investing the mail itself, which features, at that time, lay — first, in velocity unprecedented; secondly, in the power and beauty of the horses; thirdly, in the official connection with the government of a great nation; and fourthly, in the function, almost a consecrated function, of publishing and diffusing through the land the great political events, and especially the great battles during a conflict of unparalleled grandeur. These honorary distinctions are all described circumstantially in the FIRST or introductory section ("The Glory of Motion"). The three first were distinctions maintained at all times; but the fourth and grandest belonged exclusively to the war with Napoleon; and this it was which most naturally introduced Waterloo into the dream. Waterloo, I understood, was the particular feature of the "Dream Fugue" which my censors were least able to account for. [Some critics had professed their inability to apprehend the meaning of the essay.] Yet surely Waterloo, which, in common with every other great battle, it had been our special privilege to publish all over the land, most naturally entered the Dream under the license of our privilege.

So far as I know, every element in the shifting movements of the dream derived itself either primarily from the incidents of the actual scene, or from secondary features associated with the mail. For example, the cathedral isle derived itself from the mimic combination of features which grouped themselves together at the point of approaching collision, namely an arrow-like section of the road, six hundred yards long, under the solemn lights described, with lofty trees meeting overhead in arches. The guard's horn again — a humble instrument in itself — was yet glorified as the organ of publication for so many great national events. And the incidents of the Dying Trumpeter, who rises from a marble bas-relief, and carries a marble trumpet to his marble lips for the purpose of warning the female infant, was doubtless secretly suggested by my own imperfect effort to seize the guard's horn, and to blow a warning blast.

NOTES TO "LEVANA AND OUR LADIES OF SORROW."

THIS, says Professor Masson, "is of as high importance as anything he ever wrote. It is, perhaps, the highest and finest thing, and also the most constitutionally significant, in all De Quincey."

P. 114, l. 4. Lezare. Also, to console.

P. 114, l. 24. Glimmering. "As I have never allowed myself to covet any man's ox or his ass, nor anything that is his, still less would it become a philosopher to covet other people's images or metaphors. Here, therefore, I restore to Mr. Wordsworth this fine image of the revolving wheel, and the glimmering spokes, as applied by him to the flying successions of day and night. I borrowed it for one moment in order to point my own sentence; which, being done, the reader is witness that I now pay it back instantly by a note made for that sole purpose." — De Quincey.

P. 115, l. 7. Eton. A noted English school, preparatory to the universities, near Windsor, founded in 1441, by Henry VI.

P. 115, l. 7. Foundation. A permanent endowment: a scholarship.

P. 115, l. 20. Graces. The daughters of Bacchus and Venus, — Aglaia, Thalia, and Euphrosyne.

P. 115, l. 21. Parcae. The Fates, — Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos, who presided over human destiny.

P. 115, l. 24. Furies. The Avenging Deities, — Tisiphone, Alecto, and Megaera, frequently called the Eumenides (well-meaning goddesses), since people dreaded to call them by their proper name.

P. 115, l. 26. Muses. Originally three in number. Hesiod first records the name of the nine: Clio (muse of history), Euterpe (lyric poetry), Calliope (epic poetry), Polyhymnia (lofty and miscellaneous song), Erato (erotic poetry), Melpomene (tragedy), Thalia (comedy), Terpsichore (dance and song), Urania (astronomy).

P. 117, l. 14. Mater Lachrymarum. Mother of Tears.

P. 117, l. 17. Rama. See Matthew ii. 18.

P. 119, l. 17. Pariah. Originally a member of the lowest class in India; hence a social outcast. De Quincey's life when a boy in London evidently developed his sympathy with the poor and despised of both sexes.

P. 119, l. 17. Jew. For many centuries the Jews were persecuted on the slightest pretext. For some horrible facts, see Hecker's "The Black Death."

P. 119, l. 19. Norfolk Island. An island near Australia to which the worst British convicts were banished.

P. 120, l. 6. Sepulchral lamps. Lamps placed by the Romans at the tombs of relatives.

P. 120, l. 24. Cybele. The mother of Zeus (Jupiter), and of the order of deities of which he was the head, hence called the "mother of gods." She was attended by lions, and wore a mural crown.

P. 121, l. 15. Mater Tenebrarum, Mother of Darkness. The Latin word tenebrae frequently denotes the infernal regions.

P. 121, l. 16. Semnai Theai. The name given to the Furies [or Eumenides] at Athens, where they were worshipped.

"The word σεμνος is usually rendered venerable in dictionaries; not a very flattering epithet for females. But by weighing a number of passages in which the word is used pointedly, I am disposed to think that it comes nearest to our idea of the sublime, as near as a Greek word could come." — De Quincey.

"This is prose poetry: but it is more. It is a permanent addition to the mythology of the human race. As the Graces are three, as the Fates are three, as the Furies are three, as the Muses were originally three, — so may the varieties and degrees of misery that there are in the world, and the proportion of their distribution among mankind, be represented to the human imagination forever by De Quincey's Three Ladies of Sorrow and his sketch of their figures and kingdoms." — Masson.

For a discussion of the elements of poetry, defined as "the expression of the imagination," independent of versification, see Shelley's "Defence of Poetry."

NOTES TO "DINNER, REAL AND REPUTED."

THIS essay is in De Quincey's lighter vein, though with a serious purpose as expressed in the last paragraph.

P. 123, l. 6. Ridentem dicere verum quid vetat? Why should not one speak the truth with pleasantry?

P. 123, l. 21. The pourquoi of the pourquoi. The why of the wherefore.

P. 124, l. 7. In procinctu. Girded: ready for battle: a technical term. Used by Milton in "Paradise Regained."

P. 124, l. 28. Aequatis aequandis. The necessary changes having been made.

P. 126, l. 3. Seneca (B.C. 3-65 A.D.). Writer, statesman, and philosopher: "the most brilliant figure of his time."

P. 126, l. 4. Lucifugae. Light-shunners.

P. 126, l. 13. Like good boys, from seven to nine o'clock. "As I am perfectly serious, I must beg the reader, who fancies any joke in all this, to consider what an immense difference it must have made to the earth, considered as a steward of her own resources — whether great nations, in a period when their resources were so feebly developed, did, or did not, for many centuries, require candles; and, I may add, fire. The five heads of human expenditure are: 1. Food; 2. Shelter; 3. Clothing; 4. Fuel; 5. Light. All were pitched on a lower scale in the Pagan era; and the two last were almost banished from ancient housekeeping. What a great relief this must have been to our good mother, the earth! who, at first, was obliged to request of her children that they would settle around the Mediterranean. She could not even afford them water unless they would come and fetch it themselves out of a common tank or cistern." — De Quincey.

P. 126, l. 19. Numa Pompilius. The second of the legendary kings of Rome.

P. 126, l. 21. Superb. A play on the name of Tarquinius Superbus, the sixth and last legendary king of Rome.

P. 127, l. 4. Much mischief is brewed by candle-light. The author's literary work was done largely at night.

P. 127, l. 7. Barbati. Bearded; hence The Ancients, since the old Romans wore beards.

P. 127, l. 17. Matin susurrus. Morning murmuring.

P. 127, l. 18. Mane salutantes. Those saluting early in the day. "There can be no doubt that the leves of modern princes and ministers have been inherited from the ancient usage of Rome, one of which belonged to Rome republican, as well as Rome imperial. The fiction in our modern practice is, that we wait upon the lever, or rising of the prince. In France, at one era, this fiction was realized; the courtiers did really attend the king's dressing. And, as to the queen, even up to the Revolution, Marie Antoinette gave audience at her toilet." — De Quincey.

P. 127, l. 25. Jus suffragium. The right of suffrage; the ballot.

P. 128, l. 15. Galen (A.D. 130?–200?). "The most celebrated of ancient medical writers," a native of Pergamus, but for many years resident at Rome.

P. 129, l. 2. Salle à manger. Dining-room.

P. 129, l. 4. Jentabat. The form of the verb implies the habit, not a single act.

P. 129, l. 17. Artos zéros. Dry bread.

P. 129, l. 19. Salmasius (A.D. 1588–1653). "The most distinguished classical scholar of his day." De Quincey says of him: "A scholar so complete as Salmasius, whom nothing ever escapes."

P. 129, l. 25. "Siccum pro biscoccto, ut hodie vocamus, sumemus," "We take siccum, dry, to mean biscocctum, twice baked, as we say nowadays."

The two preceding and the following Latin extracts De Quincey translates.

P. 130, l. 5. Dipuros. Twice baked.

P. 130, l. 11. Barmecide feast. See unabridged dictionary.

P. 130, l. 15. Magnificum — ignotum. Omne ignotum pro mirifico, Everything not understood is considered miraculous, probably suggested this; i.e., What is not understood is magnificent.

P. 130, l. 17. Pliny the Younger (A.D. 61?–115). A Roman lawyer and man of letters, of great wealth, humanity, and piety.

P. 130, l. 24. Gustabat. De Quincey translates this word, "he broke his fast on a morsel of biscuit."

P. 130, l. 26. Prandium. Understood by some to mean dinner, by De Quincey to mean luncheon.

P. 131, l. 8. Relief—chancery. A play on legal terms.

P. 132, l. 3. Prisca, etc. "Let others take delight in old customs: I congratulate myself that I was not born till the present time. This age suits my habits."

Ovid (B.C. 43–17 A.D.). The last of the great poets of the Augustan Era.

P. 132, l. 13. "Non si male," etc. Horace, II., 10, 17. "If we do not have ill luck to-day, we shall to-morrow."

P. 133, l. 27. Raro prandebant veteres. The ancients seldom took prandium.

P. 134, l. 8. Onus. Burden.

P. 134, l. 26. Impransus. Not having had prandium.

P. 134, l. 27. Jentasse. To have had jentaculum.

P. 134, l. 29. Boukkismos. A mouthful.

P. 135, l. 12. Patronus. Patron.

P. 135, l. 17. "Romanos rerum dominos, gentemque togatam," Aeneid, I., 282. "The toga-clad nation, the Romans, masters of the world."

P. 135, l. 30. Immeasurable toga. "It is very true that in the time of Augustus the toga had disappeared amongst the lowest plebs, and greatly Augustus was shocked at that spectacle. It is a very curious fact in itself, especially as expounding the main cause of the civil wars. Mere poverty and the absence of bribery from Rome, whilst all popular competition for offices drooped, can alone explain this remarkable revolution of dress."—De Quincey.

The toga may be seen in Italy at the present time, worn on the street by beggars.

P. 136, l. 3. Uti se apicaret. That he might bask in the sun.

P. 136, l. 7. Hadrian (A.D. 76–138). One of the greatest and best of the Roman emperors, though guilty of cruelty in his old age.

P. 136, l. 9. "Civitas opulenta," etc. A state wealthy and prosperous, where no one was unemployed.

P. 136, l. 20. Faex Romuli. The dregs of the Roman populace.

P. 137, l. 1. Affiches. Placards.

P. 137, l. 18. Palaestra. Gymnasium.

P. 137, l. 27. John Quires. Quires means a Roman citizen. An expression analogous to Johnny Crapeau, slang for Frenchman.

P. 140, l. 7. Quod erat demonstrandum. Which was to be proved.

P. 141, l. 1. Agony. The word here has its original meaning, earnest struggling.

P. 141, l. 25. Quantum. Allowance.

P. 142, l. 6. Homo ferus. Savage.

P. 142, l. 7. Thyestes and Atreus. In revenge for a great wrong, Atreus killed the two sons of Thyestes, and gave the flesh as food to Thyestes, who unwittingly ate of it.

P. 142, l. 9. Milton's Death. Paradise Lost, Book II., 848.

P. 142, l. 21. His young English bride. Mary Tudor, the lovely young sister of Henry VIII. "It is odd that this amiable prince, so memorable as having been a martyr to late dining at eleven A.M., was the same person who is so equally memorable for the noble, almost the sublime answer about a King of France not remembering the wrongs of a Duke of Orleans." — De Quincey.

P. 142, l. 29. L'après diner. After dinner.

P. 143, l. 1. The Fronde. A civil war in France, 1648-51, of which De Retz was the prime instigator.

P. 143, l. 2. Line. Crossing the line is the nautical expression for crossing the equator.

P. 143, l. 10. Rebellion of 1745. The attempt of Charles Edward, grandson of James II., to secure the crown of England. The rebellion was crushed at Culloden, April 16, 1746.

P. 143, l. 12. Semina rerum. The seeds, or causes of things.

P. 143, l. 23. Cut his stick. To die. De Quincey occasionally shocks his readers by using slang. See p. 127, ll. 6, 7; p. 128, l. 28.

P. 143, l. 28. Per saltum. By a leap.

P. 144, l. 10. Lutiores. The luxurious. Lepidi homines. The refined gentlemen.

P. 145, l. 17. Their coena at noon. "The Roman gourmands and bons vivants continued through the very last ages of Rome to take their coena, when more than usually sumptuous, at noon. This indeed, all people did occasionally, just as we sometimes give a dinner, even now, as early as four P.M., under the name of a breakfast." — De Quincey.

P. 146, l. 4. Post quod non sunt lavendae manus. "After which one's hands need not be washed." See p. 134, ll. 18-21.
